

ROMANS UNDER THE EMPIRE.

VOL. I.

LONDON

PRINTED BY SPOTTISWOODE AND CO.

NEW-STREET SQUARE

GALLIA

TRANSALPINA

English Miles
50 100 150

HISTORY

OF THE

ROMANS UNDER THE EMPIRE.

BY

CHARLES MERIVALE, B.D.

RECTOR OF LAWFORD:

CHAPLAIN TO THE SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

NEW EDITION.

IN EIGHT VOLUMES.

VOLUME I.

LONDON:

LONGMAN, GREEN, LONGMAN, ROBERTS, & GREEN.

1865.

PREFACE

TO THE

FIRST EDITION OF VOL. I. AND II.

THE PORTION of this history now offered to the public embraces the period from the first Triumvirate to the death of Julius Cæsar. The life and times of the great man by whose name it might fitly be designated, present on the one hand the close, on the other the commencement of an era. Cæsar prostrated the Roman oligarchy, and laid the foundations of the Empire in the will of the middle classes. He levelled the barriers of municipality, and infused provincial blood into the senate and people of Rome. Preceding imperators had annexed provinces, Cæsar began to organize the conquests of the commonwealth. From an early period of his career he was fully conscious of the real nature of the revolution on which he was embarked; but if it was his hand that moulded and directed it, the change he effected was in fact demanded by his party and enforced by circumstances. Though the structure of his personal ambition perished with him, the social foundations on which it rested remained firmly rooted in the soil; and the comprehensive imperium of his successors rose majestic and secure from the lines originally drawn by the most sagacious statesman of the commonwealth. The Career of Cæsar is the prelude to the history of four centuries.

I have stated in my first chapter the limits I venture to assign to the work, namely, the transfer of the seat of empire from Rome to Constantinople. I shall endeavour to trace throughout the long period before me the effects of conquest and supremacy upon the Roman people; the reaction of the provinces upon the capital; the struggles of the conquered nations to assert for themselves a share in the dignities and privileges of the conquering race; and the gradual fusion into one mass of Italians, Britons, Africans, and Orientals. I shall have to inquire how far the boast of the Romans themselves was true, who, when they beheld the result of this universal fusion and settlement, exclaimed, that their city alone had been wise and just enough to promote this beneficent revolution of her own accord.¹ For we shall see that her concessions were in a great degree extorted from her; and the crowning event which obliterates the last vestige of Roman sentiments, the establishment of Christianity, was in fact the conquest of Rome by her own subjects.

The records we possess of the period to which

¹ Claudian, de Cons. Stilich. iii. 150.:

“ Hæc est in gremium victos quæ sola recepit,
Humanumque genus communi nomine fovit,
Matris non dominæ ritu; civesque vocavit
Quos domuit, nexuque pio longinuqa revinxit.

Rutilius, Itiner. i. 63.:

Fecisti patriam diversis gentibus unam,
Profuit injustis, te dominante, capi:
Dumque offers victis proprii consortia juris, Urbem fecisti quod prius orbis erat.

these two volumes are confined, are more ample than those, perhaps, of any other portion of ancient history; but the course of this work will lead us over many long and dreary tracts, diversified by few objects, and admitting of little detailed description. Bearing this in mind, I have studied not to lose sight altogether of the proportions suited to a long historical work, and have sought to compress my materials to the utmost limit consistent with perspicuity. At the same time, the remarkable deficiency of our recent literature in any complete narrative of the most interesting period of Roman annals, has constantly tempted me to expatiate; and I have been unwilling to forego the opportunity of supplying it substantially, in case circumstances should prevent the further prosecution of my general design.

The scanty illustration of these times by English writers has been amply compensated by the abundance and copiousness of the contributions of continental scholars. The volumes of Michelot, Amedée, Thierry, Duruy, Hoeck, Abeken, and others, have lain open before me throughout the course of my own studies; and the elaborate work of Drumann, in which he has amassed every notice of antiquity, and connected them all together with admirable ingenuity and judgment, has supplied me with a storehouse of references, to which I have not scrupled to resort freely. But without affecting originality, which could only have been extremely defective, I believe that much of my reading, and most of my conclusions, may lay claim at least to independence.

My obligations to Dr. Arnold's History of the Later Commonwealth are acknowledged in another place. The rapid sketch he has given of the times of Julius Cæsar deserved to be retraced by the same pen; the armour in which he made his first literary essay he would doubtless have furbished anew for a riper achievement. If he had lived to continue his general history of Rome to the period before me, it is needless to say that my ambition would have been directed elsewhere; and that, as his admirer and friend, I should have joined the public voice in hailing his extended work as worthy of himself and his subject.

“ *Si mea cum vestris valuissent vota, Pelasgi,
Non foret ambiguus tanti certaminis hæres, Tuque tuis armis, nos te poteremur, Achille.*”

ADDITIONAL PREFACE

TO

THE COMPLETE WORK.

THE PASSAGE from Rutilius which was cited at the foot of the page in my original preface, as the key-note to the ensuing history, has just been introduced with a similar view by M. Amedée Thierry, at the commencement of his latest work, the Tableau de l'Empire Romain. "Cette belle pensée," he remarks, "exprimée en si beaux vers par un poëte Gaulois du cinquième siècle. . . . m'a inspirée le plan de ce livre. Remontant à l'association des compagnons de Romulus dans l'asile des bords du Tibre, j'ai suivi pas à pas la construction de Rome latine, italienne, puis universelle, jusqu'au jour où toutes les nations civilisées et une partie des nations barbares étant réunies sous les même sceptre, il n'y eût plus dans l'ancienne monde qu'une seule cité, en travail d'un monde nouveau. De tous les points de vue de l'histoire romaine, celui-là m'a paru tout à la fois le plus élevé et le plus vrai." I could not express more plainly the idea with which I conceived the plan of this work, which embraces a portion only of the history of Rome, and as now completed, a smaller portion than I at first, perhaps too lightly, contemplated. Of the reasons which have induced me to terminate my labours with the death of M. Aurelius, I have spoken at the conclusion of the final chapter. But, while I allow the preface to my first volumes, which held out larger expectations, to stand, I will take the opportunity of issuing an edition of the complete work, to speak somewhat more particularly of the object with which it was undertaken.

M. Thierry remarks very truly that every people has two histories,—the one interior, national, and domestic, the other exterior. The former he goes on to describe as the history of its laws and institutions, and its political changes,—in one word, of its action upon itself; the latter he refers to the action of the people upon others, and the part it may claim in influencing the common destinies of the world. Of these two histories, the first cannot, of course, be fully written till the people has reached the term of its political individuality, neither can the second be written till the farthest effect of its influence can be traced and estimated. There are none of the modern nations of Europe of which even the first of these histories can yet be recounted, still less the second. The political institutions of England, France, and Germany are still in action and progress, while their ultimate effect on the destinies of mankind is lost in an unfathomable future. The great interest of Greek and Roman history consists in this, that we can trace them with singular completeness in both these respects.

The interior, or active political history of the Greeks ceases with the subjugation of their country by Alexander, or at least by the Romans; but it is from this very point that the history of their exterior influence may be said almost to commence. From this period we begin to learn how important a part the little corner of Europe, which gave birth to art and science, to politics and philosophy, was really destined to play in human affairs. The struggles of the Persian and Peloponnesian wars, the siege of Syracuse, the battle of Chæronea, sink into insignificance beside the moral revolutions effected by Plato and Aristotle, by the Sophists and the Rhetoricians, by the poets and painters, the architects and sculptors, by the early converts of Paul and Polycarp, by the fathers of the Christian Church, the Clements, Origens, and Chrysostoms. The internal and political history of Greece has exercised the pens of some of the most accomplished writers of our own day, as well as of earlier generations; but, strange to say, they have uniformly stopped at the conquest of Greece by the Macedonians or the Romans, and the subversion of her political independence, without regarding the far more interesting history of her moral influence from that moment commencing. I know of no work, in any language, on what has always seemed to me the noblest of all historical subjects, the action of Grecian ideas upon the East and the West,—upon the Egyptians, the Persians, and the Jews on the one hand, and upon the Romans on the other,—in the development of modern philosophy and religion, as well as of art and science. To trace these causes to their latest effects would be indeed a task of enormous scope and variety; but a history of the Greeks, or of the Greeks under the Roman Empire, as distinguished from the narrow and familiar curriculum of the “history of Greece,” might not have been too unwieldy for the comprehensive grasp of some of our recent historians.

Roman history presents a nearly similar division of subject and interest with the Grecian, and doubtless it may be written with almost equal completeness in both its branches. The active life of the Romans was comprehended in the series of their conquests, and our writers have generally been content with tracing it to the period when these conquests having arrived substantially at their greatest extension, and the free action of political ideas having been sacrificed to them, the internal history of the people reaches its termination. With the subjugation of the Eastern provinces, or with the civil wars which followed, and the establishment of a despotic monarchy, the interest of domestic affairs at Rome languishes or ceases; and comparatively little attention has been paid to the new interest which now begins to attach to her influence on the world around her and beneath her. I have always felt how sharp a line is here drawn between the history of Roman action and the history of Roman ideas; between the history of arms and the history of civilization. This distinction I have sought to mark by designating the work on which I have myself engaged as the history of the Romans rather than of Rome. On reviewing, indeed, what I have written, and admitting the painful consciousness of how far it falls short in scope and comprehensiveness of the idea which has from the first been present to me, I must acknowledge that I have done no more than lay the foundations of such a history of the Romans under the Empire, of their ideas and moral principles, their habits and institutions, as might, and no doubt will one day, be elaborated. The civilization of the Romans is, indeed, very closely bound up with that of the Greeks, and to many may appear to be merely subordinate to it. But both deserve to be studied and portrayed apart as well as together. It will be generally conceded that the ideas and institutions of modern Europe are derived by more direct filiation from those of Rome than of Greece; and while both the Roman and the Grecian seem, in their time, and perhaps simultaneously, to have pervaded the whole sphere of the civilized world of antiquity, I confess that my own imagination is most powerfully excited by the visible connexion between moral influence and material authority which is presented, to an extent never realized before or since, by the phenomenon of the Roman Empire.

The portion of Roman history which I have ventured to illustrate derives another interest, in my eyes, from the completeness of the gallery of national portraits which it exhibits. From Catulus and Lucullus to M. Aurelius, the series may be said to be entire. There is not one, perhaps, of the whole number of statesmen and warriors who fills an important place in the period, whose moral lineaments are not preserved for us in vivid relief by our remaining historians and biographers. And to these political celebrities may be added a list, hardly less complete, of men of letters, in whose works, still preserved, we may trace a clear impress of their social habits and intellectual training. We may picture to ourselves the characters of Virgil and Horace, Lucan and Seneca, Tacitus, Juvenal, and the elder and younger Pliny, almost as accurately as those of Cæsar and Pompeius, Augustus and Tiberius. It is only by knowing the leading minds of an age that we can truly gauge the spirit of the age itself; and in this respect we have, I think, as good means of throwing ourselves into the epoch of Augustus and of Trajan as of almost any modern period prior to our own generation, and that of our immediate predecessors. Assuredly we have no such advantages for studying the character of any other portion of antiquity. Such are the grounds on which I have thought that an account of the Romans under the Empire might be a welcome addition to the stores of English literature.

CONTENTS

OF

THE FIRST VOLUME.

CHAPTER I.

	PAGE
General principles of Roman History illustrated by the legend of the foundation of the city—Exclusion: Comprehension—Romans ; Patricians, Plebeians—Romans ; Latins — Romans ; Italians—Romans; Provincials—Tyranny of the Romans: wrongs of the provinces ; Sertorius ; Mithridates; the Pirates—Internal strength and weakness: Spartacus—Spirit of Reform: Rise of a middle class: modification of Roman ideas—Claims of the Provincials to Comprehension: their gradual recognition — Development of the idea of Unity, moral and political—Christianity : Monarchy—Extinction of Roman ideas—Scope of the work - - - - -	1

CHAPTER II.

Position and policy of the Oligarchy or Senatorial party upon the Death of Sulla—Character of its principal leaders—Catulus, Lucullus, Crassus—Pompeius, the favourite of the Senate—His pre-eminent services and rewards—He introduces reforms and countenances the claims of the Equestrian order—He retains the advocacy of Cicero—Impeachment of Verres a blow to the Oligarchical Ascendancy—Early career of Cicero His devotion to reform—His elevation to the Consulship and services to the Oligarchy—Their contempt for him and jealousy of Pompeius—Character and influence of Cato—General imbecility of the Nobles, and critical position of the Oligarchy - - - - -	49
--	----

CHAPTER III.

The Marian or popular party represented by Cæsar — His character and political views—His early dangers and good
---	--

Harasses the Senate with repeated attacks: Becomes Quæstor, AEdile, and Supreme Pontiff—The Catilinarian Conspiracy—Triumph and presumptuousness of the Nobles They defy Pompeius, despise Cicero, and adopt Cato as their leader—Character of the period—Cæsar alone fulfils the idea of the Hero demanded by the age - - - -	83
--	----

CHAPTER IV.

Defeat and death of Catilina—The Oligarchy derives great confidence from this success, and defies Pompeius—Popularity of Cicero—Cæsar's progress in the attainment of honours and power—Return of Pompeius from Asia: he resents the attitude of the Senate towards him—The Senate turns the licentiousness of Clodius to a political object—Pompeius allies himself with Cæsar and Crassus—The Triumvirate—Cæsar's Consulship, and continued hostilities between him and the Senate—He obtains the Province of Gaul—Clodius elected Tribune: His popularity, and machinations against Cicero—Abandonment of Cicero by the Consuls, and coldness of the Triumvirs—He is assailed by Clodius, and retires into exile - - - - -	127
---	-----

CHAPTER V.

Early conquests of the Gauls: their formidable hostility to Rome—Gradual success of the Romans in the contest between them—Reduction of Gallia Cisalpina—Alliance of Rome with Massilia—The Romans acquire a province beyond the Alps—Gaulish Ethnology: 1. The Iberians: 2. the Gael: 3. the Belgæ—Discrepancy between Cæsar and Strabo: modern theory of a distinction between the Kymry and Gael in Gaul as well as Britain—Physical and moral characteristics; Civilization; Religion. 4. The German tribes in Gaul—General character of the Gauls, and amount of their population - - - - -	191
--	-----

CHAPTER VI.

The Suevi enter Gaul, and establish themselves in the territory of the Sequani—The alliance of the Republic solicited by both the Gauls and Germans—Movement among the Helvetii: they threaten to enter the Roman province: Cæsar leaves Rome, and assumes his command in Gaul: repels the invasion of the Helvetii: follows them into the territory of the Ædui: defeats and compels them to return to their own country—Cæsar advances against the Suevi: negotiates with their king Ariovistus: obtains a complete victory, and expels the Germans from Gaul—Cæsar's first campaign, A.U. 696, B.C. 58 - - - - - 240
--

CHAPTER VII.

Cæsar's second campaign in Gaul, A.U. 697, B.C. 57—War with the Belgians—Reduction of the Suessiones and Bellovacii—Gallant resistance of the Nervii—General submission of the Belgian tribes, and of the north-western states of Gaul—Unsuccessful campaign of Galba in the Alps—Cæsar's third campaign, A.U. 698—Reduction of the Veneti and Armorican tribes—P. Crassus conquers the Aquitaniens—Cæsar chastises the Menapii and Morini—Pacification of Gaul - - - - - 279

CHAPTER VIII.

The banishment of Cicero is followed by the confiscation of his property—His house on the Palatine, and his Tusculan villa—Triumphant career of Clodius—He removes Cato from Rome under pretence of an honourable mission to deprive the king of Cyprus—Character of M. Brutus, who accompanies Cato—Cicero's unmanly complaints—Exertions of his friends in his behalf—Atticus: Hortensius—His wife Terentia—Reaction in his favour—Clodius disgusts Pompeius—Election of Consuls favourable to Cicero—He is recalled, and is received in Italy with acclamations, A.U. 696, 697, B.C. 58, 57 - - - - - 316

CHAPTER IX.

Pompeius obtains an extraordinary commission for supplying the city—Application of the king of Egypt to be restored to his throne—Intrigues of the nobles in relation to it—Violence of Clodius—The Triumvirs confer together at Lucca—Pompeius and Crassus elected Consuls in spite of the opposition of the Nobles—Spain and Syria decreed to them, and Cæsar's command prolonged for a second term of five years—Pompeius' theatre and shows—He remains in Italy, and governs his province by legates—Cicero reconciled with Crassus—Gabinius restores the king of

Egypt—He is impeached, attacked by Cicero, but acquitted; again accused on another charge, defended by Cicero, but condemned and banished—Cicero courts the Triumvirs—Corrupt proceedings of the candidates for the Consulship—Paralysis of the constitution—Death of Julia, and reflections on the political importance of that event, A.U. 697-700, B.C. 57-54 - - - - - 345

CHAPTER X.

Cæsar's fourth campaign, A.U. 699—Invasion of Belgium by German tribes—Cæsar drives them beyond the Rhine—Crosses that river, and chastises the Sicambri—He invades Britain—Cæsar's fifth campaign, A.U. 700—He invades Britain a second time with larger forces—Crosses the Thames, and defeats Cassivelaunus—Receives hostages and tribute, and retires—Revolt of the Gauls—Destruction of two legions in Belgium—Courageous resistance of Q. Cicero—Cæsar's sixth campaign, A.U. 701—He makes an incursion beyond the Rhine—Destruction of the Eburones—Defence of Aduatuca—Pacification of Belgium

HISTORY

OF THE

ROMANS UNDER THE EMPIRE.

CHAPTER I.

General Principles of Roman History illustrated by the Legend of the Foundation of the City. — Exclusion : Comprehension. — Romans ; Patricians, Plebeians. — Romans ; Latins. — Romans ; Italians. — Romans ; Provincials. — Tyranny of the Romans : Wrongs of the Provinces ; Sertorius ; Mithridates ; The Pirates. — Internal Strength and Weakness : Spartacus. — Spirit of Reform : Rise of a Middle Class : Modification of Roman Ideas. — Claims of the Provincials to Comprehension : their Gradual Recognition. — Development of the Idea of Unity, Moral and Political. — Christianity : Monarchy. — Extinction of Roman Ideas. — Scope of the Work.

THE ROMANS regarded the Palatine as the cradle of the City of the Seven Hills. It was from the opposite slope of the Janiculum that they delighted to behold the chain of eminences which surrounded this central summit, and comprehended within its circuit the most interesting sites and monuments of their history.¹ The configuration of the six exterior heights, from the Capitoline on the left to the Aventine on the right, presented an almost continuous ridge of unequal elevation, abutting at either extremity on the channel of the Tiber. Between the Aventine and the Cælian a small stream made its way into the inclosure,

Contrast between the Palatine and Aventine hills as sites
for a city.

¹ “Hinc septem dominos videre montes, Et totam licet cœstimare Romanam.” Martial, iv. 64.

and the ravine in this quarter was diligently fortified from an early period. The mound of Servius¹ lined the crest of the Quirinal and the Esquiline, where the city seemed accessible, not from any depression in its natural rampart, but from the gentleness of the exterior acclivity. It was not till the time of Trajan that an opening was excavated between the Capitoline and the Quirinal. Where the Tiber first fell under the shadow of the Servian walls, the Capitoline descended abruptly into the hollow, and sustained on its precipitous summits the defences of the city to the north.¹ The Aventine, presenting the opposite horn of the ridge, sloped gradually to the water's edge, and might seem from its position to invite the commerce of the world to the widest and richest valley south of the Apennines, teeming with the products of Etruscan civilization. Its aboriginal monsters were exterminated by the Tyrian Hercules, the genius of commercial enterprize.² But in the depths of antiquity, before the foundations of Rome were laid, the single outlet to the waters which collected round the base of the Palatine, was choked by a desolate morass, and the rank growth of primitive forests buried the central eminence in almost impenetrable concealment. Such a position was admirably adapted for a place of retreat, and offered an impregnable shelter to crime and rapine. It seemed created by Nature herself to be the stronghold of a people of reserved character and predatory habits. It was destined to become the den of the wolves of Italy.¹ The legend of the foundation of the Eternal City, which affirmed that the divine omens decided the contest of the brothers and the pretensions of the rival summits, furnishes a striking illustration of the subsequent fortunes of the Roman people. They chose between a career of conquest and plunder, and of discovery and commerce. Romulus founded Rome, Remus might have founded a Carthage.

¹ "Ut unus aditus qui esset inter Esquilinum Quirinumque montem maximo aggere objecto fossa cingeretur altissima." Cic. de Rep. ii. 6. Arnold (Hist. of Rome, i. 51.) has described this locality by a just and lively image. It is remarkable that Cicero makes no mention of the hollow through which the Aqua Crabra flowed into the city, which was fortified by the Agger Quiritum of Ancus (Liv. i. 33.); but he was thinking only of defences against invasion from the north.

² See the Legend of Cacus, Virg. Aen. viii.

"Cacus Aventinæ timor atque infamia sylva." Ovid, Fast. i. 551.

Nor is it only in the local features of its original birthplace that the isolation of the Roman character is thus vividly depicted. The native ferocity of the people is stamped upon its earliest traditions. The author of the race, it was said, was rejected and exposed by his natural guardians. The sustenance denied him by man was afforded him by the most savage beast of the desert. He grew up to slay his oppressor, to summon the injured and the outlawed to his standard, and wreak with them wild vengeance upon mankind around him. In the same manner, the morose pride of the Roman people, and their antipathy to foreign habits, are strongly marked on every page of their history. They scorned the humanizing pursuits of commerce, and the genial tendencies of social refinement. They were inflamed by a passion for destroying the monuments of their conquered enemies, their arts and literature. They established the most odious distinctions between themselves and their subjects, insulted them by their legislation, and defamed them in their histories.

The Roman polity, however, presents another side which lays much greater claim to our interest. It was compelled at sundry periods to abandon its proud exclusive principles, and court for self-preservation the alliance of aliens,

Antipathy of the Romans to foreigners.

The policy of comprehension is forced upon them.

¹ Such was the expression of Telesinus the Samnite : " Nunquam defuturos raptiores Italicae libertatis lupos, nisi sylva in quam refugere solerent esset excisa." — Vell. ii. 27.

and even enemies. The annals of the Roman people afford a conspicuous illustration of the natural laws which seem to control the rise and progress of nations. The almost uninterrupted succession of their triumphs, the enormous extent of the dominion they acquired, and the completeness of the cycle through which they passed from infancy to decay, combine to present them to us as the normal type of a conquering race. One principle seems to be established by their history. It is the condition of permanent dominion, that the conquerors should absorb the conquered gradually into their own body, by extending, as circumstances arise, a share in their own exclusive privileges to the masses from whom they have torn their original independence. Thus only can they provide a constant supply of fresh blood to recruit their own exhausted energies, and strengthen the basis of their power while they extend the limits of their conquests.

All conquering nations instinctively resent this sacrifice of pride and immediate interest; all struggle blindly against it; the more readily they submit to the necessity, the longer do they retain the vitality of their institutions, and repel the natural advances of decay. The obstinacy with which the Dorian conquerors of Sparta resisted this necessity checked their career of aggrandizement, and brought their political existence to a premature termination. We are ourselves witnesses at the present day to the consequences of such resistance in the impending ruin of a more magnificent empire, the dominion of the Turks in Greece and western Asia. On the other hand, the latest conquerors of our own island, as well as those of Gaul, have acknowledged the condition attached to their triumph; and the effects of their victory, itself long since forgotten, have endured through a succession of many centuries. It was by gradually communi-

This policy
the necessary condition of permanent dominion.

cating to their subjects, however reluctantly, the outward badges and privileges of the conquering caste, that both the Normans and the Franks have averted the reaction which must otherwise, sooner or later, have swept away the progeny of a mere handful of adventurers. But in relinquishing the privileges extorted by arms, these invaders have retained the ascendancy due to their political genius, and have each impressed their own character indelibly upon the common institutions of the victors and the vanquished. Again, the time may arrive in the social progress of a nation when the incorporation of its component elements has become complete, but the struggle of races has been succeeded by a struggle of ideas; the conflicting interests and feelings of different classes may require a similar system of timely concession; the rise, for instance, of new religious convictions may threaten to act with explosive force in the bosom of society, and demand a new social combination at the hands of prudent statesmen. In this respect also the history of the Roman people in its latest developments furnishes a manual of experience to the philosophical inquirer.

The spirit of this assimilative principle, if we may so denominate it, may be traced in the venerable legend which related the deed of violence by which the founder of the city sought to multiply the numbers of his subjects. The contest with the Sabines, who resented the rape of their women, ended in the association of the hostile tribes in the bonds of kinship and alliance. The divided throne of Romulus and Tatius was a type of the double chairs of the patrician and plebeian consuls, and of the successive extension of the Roman franchise to the Latins, the Italians, and the Provincials. The infant colony, thus recruited, sprang rapidly into vigorous adolescence. The city of Roof assimilation traced in the earliest legends of Rome.

The principle

mulus spread from the Palatine over the surrounding ridge, and connected with a single wall the fortresses which were planted on its heights.¹ The commonwealth grew in fame and fortune by the periodical repetition of this original experiment; by carrying out this principle of incorporation still more widely it finally rose to empire.

Nevertheless, a large portion of the history of Rome is no other than a record of the desperate resistance she offered to the claims of her subjects for comprehension within the pale of her privileges. The timely amalgamation which took place so repeatedly between the conquerors and the conquered, is to be attributed to the good fortune of the commonwealth rather than to the wisdom and foresight of her rulers. Under the regal government, indeed, as far as we may trust the records which have descended to us, the principle of equal association was admitted and practised liberally. Romulus shared his throne with the king of the Sabines. Tullus transplanted to Rome the citizens of Alba. The most ancient enumerations of the Roman people seem to indicate, by their rapid increase, that they carried out this policy systematically as long as they were governed by kings. But as the monarchical form of government generally favours the obliteration of distinctions between the various elements which compose a nation, so the oligarchy which supplanted the dynasty of the Tarquins displayed the opposite tendency congenial to a more jealous polity. As the light begins to brighten about the cradle of the Roman institutions, we discover distinct traces of the existence within their pale, not of two classes only, the warriors and their subjects, but of a third also, occupying a position between the

Struggle between the patricians and plebeians.

¹ "Septemque una sibi muro circumdedit arces."

Virg. Georg. ii. in fin.

others, sharing in the name and in an inferior degree in the rights and privileges of the dominant class. The patricians and plebeians of Rome represent, at this early period, two races of different origin, the former of which has admitted the other, whether on compulsion or by concession, after a fruitless resistance, or by spontaneous arrangement, to a certain prescribed share in the privileges of government and the rights of conquest. It exacts, in return, a strict alliance against the unruly subjects and the enemies common to both. During a century and a half of republican government, while the external policy of the state is developing its tendency to universal aggression, and the work of aggrandizement and self-defence seem, to the eye of the mere bystander, to be animated by a common instinct, there exists, nevertheless, internally a strong under-current of hostility between these jealous yokefellows. The plebs is resolutely working its way to the attainment of complete equality with the populus, to the common enjoyment of all public honours and emoluments, and a pledge for the personal consideration of its members. Its numbers are gradually, although slowly, augmented by the admission into its ranks of the class of freedmen, those whom compassion, gratitude, or interest have elevated occasionally from servitude to civil privileges. In some cases the whole free population of an allied or friendly city was admitted in a body to the rights of Roman citizenship. Enrolled in one of the existing plebeian tribes, or adding another to the number, it directly increased the power and influence of the inferior order, while at the same time, as the clientele of some patrician house, it reflected additional lustre upon the more dignified class. At last the commons attain their object. They acquire an equal share in the public offices and honours, participate in the same system of law, in the same rites of religion, and in the common fruits of conquest. The two nations coalesce into one. From this era the body politic appears to be animated with new vigour. The career of victory is no longer checked by the defection of the bulk of the people at some important crisis. The hostility of the enemy is no longer encouraged by the suspicion that the councils of his adversary are divided. The course of another century witnesses the extension of the Roman dominion over the whole of Italy, and the vigorous republic is now prepared to contest the sovereignty of the West with the long-settled and deep-rooted power of Carthage.

We find, however, that the Romans do not enter upon this mortal conflict in exclusive dependence upon their own resources. The burghers and the commonalty together are already far outnumbered by the multitude of their subjects, whom they continue to treat as aliens, who are jealous of their sway, and may be expected to rise against them at any favourable opportunity. The strength of the Romans must be invigorated, that of the Italians reduced. Accordingly, we remark the institution of a new form of qualified citizenship conferred upon certain dependent societies, either as a reward for good service to the republic, or to appease their cravings for union with it. The Latin franchise, as it was termed from the people to whom it was first assigned, placed its possessor in a state of subordinate communion with the Roman people. The principal advantage which it conferred related to the means of holding and disposing of property; but the Latin was not deemed worthy to mingle his blood with the Roman, and the child of a mixed marriage became a Latin, and not a Roman citizen. Nor did the republic concede to these dependents the complete right of suffrage. The discharge of certain local magistracies, accessible of course to a few only, was required as a title to enrolment in a plebeian tribe, and the full acquisition of her privileges. In return she required the recipients of her favour to enlist without hesitation in her service. To be admitted, however, even on such unequal terms, to partnership with the victorious republic was an honour much esteemed. Gradually extended to a considerable number of Italian towns, particularly in Samnium and Campania, and afterwards beyond the sea, it conciliated many doubtful friends and materially contributed to the strength of Rome.

The Latin franchise, and comprehension of the allies in the Roman state.

It was obvious, however, that in giving her subjects this foretaste of the sweets of sovereignty, the republic fostered the demand for their full and unrestrained enjoyment. Meanwhile, not only was her genuine blood drained by constant warfare, but every new conquest required a fresh effusion from her veins to garrison or to colonize it. Whilst she strove to repair the losses of war in her dependencies, she enhanced the injury which it had inflicted upon herself. The claim of citizenship extended with every new conquest, strengthened in every crisis of her weakness, and gathered courage from her internal dissensions. Within the walls of Rome itself the old contest of the burghers with the commonalty had been insensibly transferred to the richer and poorer classes, the nobility and the populace. Undoubtedly many families of the plebs were as noble and as wealthy as any of the patrician order; but the latter were all ennobled by birth and station, and the political advantages, of which they enjoyed so large a share, had as yet allowed few to descend into poverty. The mass of the plebeians, on the other hand, comprehended all the citizens of obscurer birth, and nearly all of inferior means. Accordingly, when a struggle arose between the upper and lower classes, old names and old jealousies were appealed to on both sides;

Contest of patricians and
plebeians transferred to the richer and poorer classes.

the contest assumed the title of one between patricians and plebeians, and the name probably conduced to give a false colour and illegitimate tendency to the thing. The poorer classes claimed certain rights with regard to the public property, of which they had been dispossessed, not as plebeians, but simply as citizens; but their cause was advocated by the tribunes of the plebs; the prejudices of the plebs, of every one enrolled in a plebeian tribe, whether noble or mean, rich or poor, were invoked in its support. It was the sympathy of old association, rather than any actual participation in injury, that drew the members of the plebeian nobility into a quarrel altogether apart from their personal interest, or rather one which was contrary to it. The attraction was not universal; many of the richer plebeians fell into the ranks of the patrician aristocracy which generally opposed these claims; and in the subsequent phases which the contest assumed, individuals were found to fluctuate reciprocally from the one side to the other. But the struggles of the privileged and the unprivileged continued to be described by the old party designations, and the popular faction might be astonished at triumphing under the leadership of the patrician Julius, while the nobles accepted with distaste and reluctance the services of a plebeian Porcius and Pompeius.

The Licinian rogations, enacted in the year 389 of the city, had laid the foundations of a virtual equality between the patrician and plebeian orders. The principle of the most important of these measures was to destroy the actual monopoly of the use of the public lands which the patricians enjoyed, and to limit the occupation of each citizen to a certain number of acres. Since that time, however, the rich and powerful had again gradually encroached upon this regulation, and while they grasped immense tracts of enactments :

Proprietary
the Licinian rogations :
the Agrarian laws of the Gracchi.

land, which they could not profitably occupy, had left a vast proportion of the poorer citizens without their rightful means of subsistence. The law in fact had fallen into desuetude. Tiberius Gracchus, alarmed at the progressive depopulation of Italy, and perceiving how the enormous disproportion of properties was tending to extirpate the mass of the free citizens, fixed his eye upon these obsolete enactments as the legitimate means of restoring the balance between the rich and poor. His immediate object was, not the enrichment or elevation of the plebeians, but simply the restoration of the needier citizens to a state of honourable independence. The actual law was doubly favourable to his views of re-distribution; for not only had the Licinian rogations never been abrogated, but the title by which alone public land could be occupied was always, in strictness, revocable by the state. It was not the nobility of Rome only who were alarmed by the project of this new agrarian division. The Italians also combined with them in determined opposition to it.¹ The senates of the Italian towns were at this time even more aristocratic than that of Rome itself; for amidst all the popular modifications to which her own constitution was subjected, it had always been the policy of the republic to stifle democratic movements in her dependencies. It is probable, therefore, that the Italian governments were attached to the Roman nobility by mutual interests and sympathies. The nobles repaid their goodwill with kindly offices, and to many of the allies the use of portions of public land, so jealously withheld from their paupers at home, was conceded by special enactment, to more, perhaps, by favour and connivance.

¹ "Nobilitas noxia atque eo perculta, modo per socios et nomine Latinum . . . Gracchorum actionibus obviam icrat."—Sallust, Bell. Jugurth. 42. Comp. Prosper Merimée, Etudes sur l'Histoire Romaine, i. 48.

The state derives strength from this concession. Claims of the Italian allies to the Roman
franchise.
Resistance
of the Romans. The Social war.
Triumph of
the Romans, but eventual concession of the claims.
A. U. 666.
B. C. 88.

Notwithstanding this foreign support the aristocracy were foiled by the courage and patriotism of the Gracchi, who acted with that thorough faith in the truth and justice of their cause, which affords the surest promise of success. The agrarian laws were carried, though their authors perished in the struggle, and these enactments proved thoroughly too intricate and impracticable to be ever executed. But imperfectly as they were administered, their effect was still stringent and salutary. Hence the extraordinary energy which the republic displayed during the thirty years that followed; hence the destruction of Jugurtha and the Cimbri, and the repeated triumphs of Marius and Metellus, of Fabius and Scaurus. Meanwhile the Italians had been brooding in secret over the ideas which the late reformation had suggested to them. They acknowledged, upon reflection, that the precarious enjoyment of a few acres of the public land was a privilege far inferior in value to the franchise of the city. The popular party in Rome were still restless, and disturbed the state with demands for new agrarian laws to remedy the inefficiency of the former. The agitators encouraged the demands of the Italians, who now assailed with importunity and menace the prescriptions of the Roman polity.² Great was the outcry of the nobles against their treacherous compatriots who were prepared to level the barriers of exclusion. As usual in popular struggles, moderate concessions were refused, and extreme measures the more vehemently demanded.¹ The nobles flew to arms with a spirit that cowed domestic treason, while it maintained its ground no less resolutely against foreign aggression. The apprehensions entertained by the ruling class of the personal loss which would ensue to them from the admission to public honours and emoluments of such a host of competitors, not less, perhaps, an honourable though mistaken abhorrence of the dilution of Roman blood and Roman sentiments from this foreign influx, united both the patricians and plebeians amongst them in one stern and indomitable phalanx. Alone, amidst every combination of dissension and treachery at home, did this old nobility, a few hundred families at most, maintain the struggle by their courage and wealth, against the whole force of Italy, precipitated into arms at the brilliant prospects revealed by the popular intriguers. As the contest proceeded, the claim to citizenship was exchanged for the deadliest vows of extermination, and it was for their existence rather than their prerogatives that the Romans had to contend. The result of the contest was in every way worthy of their military and political reputation. Successful everywhere in the field, they paused at the moment of victory, and to each nation, as it resigned its claims, presented the boon of citizenship as a free gift. The whole of Italy received the full franchise of the city.²

¹ Appian (Bell. Civ. i. 18.) describes how they were harassed by the commissioners who attempted to carry out the appointed re-distribution of land. Ταῦτα τε δὴ καὶ τὰς ἐπὶ τούτοις τῶν δικαζόντων ἐπείξεις οὐ φέροντες οἱ Ἰταλιῶται. . . .

² Καὶ τινες εἰσηγοῦντο τοὺς συμμάχους ἀπαντας, οἱ δὴ περὶ τῆς γῆς μάλιστα ἀντέλεγον, εἰς τὴν Ἀρμαλῶν πολιτείαν ἀναγράψαι, ὡς μείζονι χάρτι περὶ τῆς γῆς οὐ διοισομένους. καὶ ἐδέχοντο ἀσμενοὶ τοῦθ' οἱ Ἰταλιῶται, προτιθέντες τῶν χωρίων τὴν πολιτείαν.—Appian, B. C. i. 21. Comp. i. 34.

¹ Val. Max. ix. 5. 1.; Merimée, i. 60.

² Appian, Bell. Civ. i. 49.; Vell. ii. 17. The principal enactments by which the franchise was extended to the Italians were the Lex Julia (A. U. 664.) and the Lex Plautia Papiria (A. U. 665.). But the actual process of enfranchisement was more gradual than has generally been supposed. Many difficulties were thrown in the way of the claimants; the acquisition of the metropolitan required the relinquishment of the local franchise. Several states declined the honour. See Duruy's elaborate note, Hist. des Romains, ii. 213.; and Niebuhr, Lect. on Rom. Hist. i. 387.

The Romans had now arrived at that period in their career as a nation, at which the existing generation begins to reflect upon the past, and to trace the steps by which it has arrived at its actual position. They could not fail to recognize the peculiar feature which distinguishes their history from that of all the popular governments of antiquity, the principle of expansion and association, which had carried them triumphantly through every crisis, and strengthened year by year the foundations of their magnificent empire. Sallust hails with satisfaction the early application of this happy policy by the founder of the city¹; and it is to this pre-eminently that Cicero attributes the extent and vitality of the Roman dominion.² Dionysius, in the striking passage in which he enumerates the principal causes of the grandeur of the people, who had mortified Grecian vanity by their easy overthrow of the descendants of Leonidas and Themistocles, contrasts the humane and liberal policy of the Romans with the feeble jealousy and exclusiveness of his own countrymen.³ *What was the cause, says Tacitus, of the fall of the Lacedæmonians and Athenians, but that, powerful as they were in arms, they spurned their subjects from them as aliens?*⁴

The nobles, although they had given way to their opponents on the vital point of the right of suffrage, still clung to the hope of maintaining their superiority. At first they tried to limit the preponderance of new voters by arbitrarily restricting them to a small

Triumph of the popular party in Rome contemporaneously with the enfranchisement of the Italians.

¹ Sallust, Bell. Catil. 6.

² Cic. pro Balbo, 31.

³ Dionys. Hal. Ant. Rom. ii. 16, 17.

⁴ Tac. Ann. xi. 24.; where the remark is put in the mouth of the Emperor Claudius, when he urged the senate, according to his uniform policy to extend the franchise to the mass of the Gaulish people. He adds, "At conditor noster Romulus tantum sapientia valuit, ut plerosque populos eodem die hostes dein cives habuerit."

number of the tribes.¹ But amidst the violence of the civil wars, which assailed the most sacred landmarks of the constitution, such invidious distinctions could not long be maintained. On the first triumph of the popular party, its leader hastened to reward the services of the Italians by abolishing these injurious restrictions. The whole of the tribes were now thrown open to them, and from this time it was evident that they had it in their power, by acting with steadiness and concert, completely to master the genuine Romans in the comitia. But many causes combined to avert this result. The Italians had no longer any distinct interest at variance with that of the Romans, while they retained many causes of jealousy and disunion among themselves. The distance at which they lay from the centre of action made it impossible for them to watch the shifting currents of the forum, and the inactivity to which they were thus condemned by their position soon rendered them wholly indifferent to questions of temporary interest. The apprehension, therefore, that the introduction of the Italian element into the constitution would have the effect of Italianizing Rome, was totally groundless. Nevertheless, it is certain that from this time must be dated the decay of the Roman nationality, though we must look to another quarter for its cause. The city became from henceforth the common resort of all that was neediest and vilest in the suburban population. The forum was occupied by dissolute and reckless mobs, eager to sell themselves to the demagogues of any party, controlling the elections by corruption or violence, obstructing the march of public affairs, rendering law impotent and justice impracticable. Conscious of their strength and services, these hungry mercenaries claimed a subsidy from the faction they kept in power. They quartered themselves on the government, which was compelled to tax, for their maintenance, the industry of the provinces. At this crisis the suffrages of the Italians might have saved Rome. But the statesmen of the day failed to discover the means, obvious as they may appear to us, by which the votes of the distant municipals might be brought to bear against the rabble of the city. The idea of popular representation was altogether foreign to the habits of the age: it was not till a later generation that it first glimmered upon the mind of the wariest of Roman legislators.¹ We may imagine, however, that the introduction of such a system by a strong government, like that of Sulla, might have infused a new element of stability into the tottering machine of the republican constitution.

¹ The original arrangement lasted so short a time that its nature seems to have been speedily forgotten. Velleius (ii. 20.) says that the Italians were enrolled in eight tribes, apparently eight of the existing thirty-five; on the other hand, Appian (B. C. i. 49.) affirms that ten new tribes were created for them. In either case they were liable to be overwhelmed by the old Roman citizens in the comitia, where questions were decided by the majority, not of votes, but of tribes.

Marius was wafted into power with the full tide of the Italian confederacy. He was the first to proscribe and massacre the leaders of the party opposed to him²: but his views were narrow and sordid, and he took no measures to secure the ascendancy of the popular faction which he had led to victory. Satiated with the acquisition of a seventh consulship, he was snatched away by a timely death from the disgrace

Oligarchical reaction under Sulla, and ascendancy of the exclusive or Roman policy.

¹ Suet. Oct. 46.: “Excogitato genere suffragiorum quæ de magistratis urbicis decuriones colonici in sua quisque Colonia ferrent, et sub diem comitiorum obsignata Romam mitterent.” The precise nature of the enactment of the emperor Augustus, here referred to, will be examined hereafter.

² Sulla indeed was the first who decreed a proscription by law; and on this account Velleius assigns him the ignominy of inventing this mode of carrying on the struggle. “Primus ille exemplum proscriptionis invenit.” ii. 28.

and ruin with which his friends were speedily overtaken.¹ The return of Sulla, the champion of the nobility, with his veteran legions from Asia, surprised them without plans or resources. The younger Marius threw himself into the arms of the Samnites, still the implacable enemies of Rome, and offered to transfer to their country the seat of empire. The views of Sulla, on the other hand, were thoroughly national. The massacres by which he decimated the Italian races, the proscriptions by which he swept off the leaders of the popular party in the city, together with his vigorous exercise of the extraordinary powers which the gratitude of the triumphant nobles conferred upon him, in abrogating laws which had fixed, for more than a generation, the balance of the constitution, all tended to the same end, the restoration and defence of the Roman oligarchy. Even his introduction of a multitude of soldiers and slaves to the franchise, revolutionary as it was in principle, found its excuse in the aim he had in view, that of counteracting the suffrages of the Italians, which even he dared not absolutely annul. He abridged the power of the tribunes,² who, in addition to their original office of protecting the interests of the plebs, had usurped direct control over the deliberations of the senate. He restored to that body the judicia, a prerogative eagerly coveted and jealously guarded; for the senatorial judices, or judges, reigned irresponsibly in the public tribunals, screened their friends and condemned their enemies, gorged themselves individually with bribes, and maintained with relentless tyranny the system of provincial oppression by which they profited as a class. The popular party was cowed, and the nobles promised themselves a long enjoyment of the new oligarchical constitution. Their gratitude for his services, together with the devotion of his veterans, and the terror of his own name, maintained the dictator in undisputed power, and continued to protect his person after his abdication.

¹ Merimée thinks that Marius committed suicide, i. 247.; see Plutarch, Mar. 45.

² Liv. Epit. lxxxix. ; Vell. ii. 30. ; Appian, B.C. i. 100. ; Cic. de Leg. iii. 9. : "In ista quidem re vehementer Sullam probo, qui tribunis plebis sua lego injuriæ faciendæ potestatam ademerit, auxilii ferendi reliquerit.

The course of events will lead us, on some future occasions, to trace the remains of resentment and antipathy to Rome which lingered long in some regions of the peninsula; but, for the most part, the ambition of the Italian races was now quelled; they were content to regard the city of Romulus as their own metropolis, and, while they enjoyed the fruits of her wide-wasting domination, gradually learned to take pride in her name. We must now extend a cursory glance beyond the limits of Italy, and estimate, from the condition of her subject territories, the good fortune of Rome, which had thus acquired new strength and resources in a momentous crisis of her external affairs.

Italia, the region to which the privileges of the city had been conceded by the Plautian law, was bounded by a line drawn across the neck of the peninsula, from the Æsar on the lower sea, to the Rubicon on the upper. To the north and south lay two provinces which held the first rank in political importance; on the one hand Gallia, or Gaul within the Alps, on the other Sicily. The Gaulish province was divided into two districts by the river Padus, or Po, from whence they derived their denominations respectively, according as they lay within or beyond that boundary. But the whole of this rich and extensive region was placed under the command of a single proconsul, and the citizens soon learned to regard with jealousy a military force

Acquiescence
of the Italians in Sulla's political settlement

The Roman
provinces.
Gallia Cisalpina; Sicily and the islands, Spain and the Province beyond
the Alps.

which menaced their own liberties at the same time that it maintained the obedience of their subjects. Sicily, on the other hand, though tranquil and contented, and requiring but a small force to control it, was important to the republic from the abundance of its harvests, to which the city could most confidently look for its necessary supplies of grain. Next among its provinces in proximity to Rome were the islands of Sardinia and Corsica, of which the former also furnished Italy with corn; but both were rude and imperfectly cultivated, and the unhealthiness of the larger island especially continued to keep it below many far remoter regions in wealth, population, and intelligence. The first province which the Romans had acquired beyond their own seas was Spain, where their arms had made slow but steady progress from the period of their earliest contests with the Carthaginians, although the legions had never yet penetrated into its wildest and most distant fastnesses. The connexion between Rome and her Iberian dependencies was long maintained principally by sea, while the wide territory which intervenes between the Alps and the Pyrenees was still occupied by numerous free and jealous communities. But the republic acquired possessions on the coast of the Gulf of Lyons, which gradually extended inland to the Lake of Geneva on the one side and the Cevennes on the other. To this district she gave the name of the Province. She established remoter colonies at Narbo and Tolosa, and finally secured an uninterrupted line of communication from the Var to the Garonne.

The Adriatic and the Ionian Straits separated Italy from her eastern acquisitions. The great provinces of Illyricum and Macedonia comprised the whole expanse of territory from the Adriatic to the Ægean Sea, and were divided from one another by the long mountain-ridges of Boion and Scardus. Ancient Greece, from Thermo-

The provinces
beyond the Adriatic.

'pylæ to Cape Malea, constituted a single command under the title of Achaia. With Asia Rome communicated principally by sea, the route of the Hellespont being insecure, and the barbarous tribes of Thrace but imperfectly subjected¹. The republic had constituted a province in the western portion of Asia Minor, and controlled the dependent potentates of Bithynia, Cilicia and Cappadocia. But her supremacy in these regions were contested by Mithridates, the great king of Pontus, and her acquisitions more than once seemed lost to her for ever. On the southern coasts of the great inland sea, the domain which once belonged to Carthage, limited on either side by the lesser Syrtis and the river Bagrada, was the only country which acknowledged her domination. The extent of her empire, under Sulla, was hardly one half of that which it attained under Augustus and Trajan.

The various relations in which the different classes of the provincial population stood to the ruling city, have been compared with the constitution of a Roman household. The colonies of Roman citizens planted in the provinces, enjoying the full exercise of their national rights, and presenting a miniature of the metropolis herself, held the position of the son towards the paterfamilias: the conquered races, which had thrown themselves on the victor's mercy, were subjected to his dominion as unreservedly as the slave to that of his master: those among them to whom the state had restored their lands and institutions, occupied a place analogous to that of freedmen. Some cities or nations had voluntarily sought a connexion with Rome on terms of alliance, but with acknowledged inferiority; others, again, stood on a more independent footing, offering a mutual interchange of good offices and of citizenship; and lastly, there were some which entered into confederacy with the republic with perfect equality of rights on both sides. All these had their prototypes respectively in the clients, the guests, and the friends of the Roman noble. Within the limits of each Roman province there were generally some states which stood in these several relations to the republic; and the strictness of the military and civil administration of the country was maintained or relaxed towards them according to their respective claims. But, after all, the mass of the provincial population belonged to the class of dediticii, that is, those who had originally submitted without conditions, the slaves, as they may be termed, of the great Roman family. These were subjected to the severest fiscal and other burdens, enhanced by the rapacity of their rulers, who, from the consul or prætor to the lowest of their officers, preyed upon them without remorse and without satiety.

¹ Cicero, De Prov. Consul. 2., makes mention of a military way through Macedonia to the Hellespont.

The appointment to the provincial commands was left ordinarily in the hands of the senate; nevertheless the people continued to regard it as their own indefeasible prerogative, and sometimes, at the instigation of their demagogues, did not hesitate to resume it. It was the general rule that the consuls and prætors, after serving their year of office in the city, should proceed to administer for one or sometimes three years the affairs of a province. The state placed large standing armies at their disposal, threw enormous patronage into their hands, and their ambition, avarice, or mutual rivalry, far more than any sense of the public interests, impelled them to exert themselves, during their brief career, in reducing frontier tribes, in quelling insurrections which their own injustice excited, and whenever they could find an excuse for it, in annihilating the ancient liberties and privileges of the provinces by proconsuls,

Government
&c.

still retained by the more favoured classes of the provincials. Surrounded by an army of officials, all creatures of their own, all engaged in the same work of carving out fortunes for themselves, and abetting their colleagues, the proconsuls had little sense of responsibility to the central government, and glutted their cupidity without restraint. Of all the provinces the Cisalpine and Macedonia, and latterly Syria, were the richest and most amply furnished with military armaments, and on both these accounts they were generally coveted by the consuls, and distributed between them by lot. The tithes, tolls and other imposts, from which the public revenue was drawn, were farmed by Roman contractors, belonging generally to the order of knights, who had few opportunities of rising to the highest political offices at home ; and the connivance of their superiors in the province, backed by the corrupt state of public feeling in Rome, shielded, to a great extent, the sordid arts by which they defrauded both the state and its subjects. The means of enrichment which the provinces afforded to the nobility became the ultimate object of the deepest political intrigues. A man of ruined fortune looked to the office of proconsul as the sole means of retrieving his affairs. To obtain it, he allied himself with the chief or the party by whose influence he might hope to rise successively through the various steps which led to the consulship. He first sued for the post of quæstor, after a due interval he might hope to be elected ædile, next prætor, and ultimately consul. His grand object was then obtained, for upon the expiration of his term of office he departed as governor to a consular province ; from the emoluments of which he calculated on repaying the expenses of his various contests, on liquidating the debt of gratitude to his adherents, and accumulating a vast fortune for his own gratification, or the advancement of his party.

The cupidity which animated individuals was in fact the mainspring of the political factions of the time. The spoil of the provinces was the bait with which the popular leaders had lured the Italians to their standards. All the legal rights of citizenship had been conceded, but the old oligarchic families, dignified by historic associations, and revelling in the wealth accumulated by centuries of conquest, still hoped to maintain their grasp of the larger share of honours and emoluments which they had contrived to make generally accessible only to the richest. They still looked with scorn themselves, and infused the same sentiment into their inferiors, on the New Men, the men of talents and education, but of moderate origin and fortune, who were striving on all sides to thrust themselves into public notice. The judicia, or occupation of the bench of justice, was the great instrument by which they protected their monopoly; for by keeping this in their own hands they could quash every attempt at revealing, by legal process, the enormities of the provincial administration. This was the battle-field to which, as we shall see, the instinct of the orator led Cicero to transfer the contest; and when, by a concurrence of fortunate circumstances, he found the means of revealing in one amazing instance the glaring iniquity of the system, the nobles were forced to surrender, if not their prerogatives, at least their impunity in abusing them. But as far as each party succeeded in retaining or extorting a share in the plunder, the same system was carried on by both. It would be unfair to point to either as exceeding the other in rapacity and tyranny. The distress and consequent alienation of the provinces became the pressing evil and danger of the times.¹ Adventurers sprang up in every

Wrongs and discontent of the provincials.

¹ We may indeed infer, from a remarkable passage in Cicero, that even the fiscal oppression of the Romans was not so galling as that quarter, and found a floating mass of discontent around them, from which they were certain of deriving direct assistance, or of meeting at least with sullen approbation.

Their discontent breaks forth in various quarters.

The retirement of Sulla proved how necessary his energy and reputation had been to sustain the weight of empire upon the slender basis of the oligarchical faction.

In the west the whole Spanish nation rose against its oppressors. In the farthest east the ability of Mithridates was seconded by the good will of the conquered races of Asia Minor. Wherever he advanced his ensigns, the people rose without hesitation, and welcomed him as their deliverer. At the same time the oppression of the conquerors of the world had driven thousands from honest and peaceful occupations to resort to piracy for vengeance or subsistence. The roving corsairs of the Cilician coast found their resources multiplied by the conflux of these restless and discontented adventurers, and their vessels penetrated all the gulfs, and insulted every harbour in the Mediterranean, with a system of organization coextensive with the great sphere of maritime traffic.¹ It was not till these various combinations of her foes and subjects against her were successively suppressed, that the power of Rome was finally established throughout her dominions. It will be instructive to fix our eyes for a moment upon them.—

which the provincials sometimes exercised upon one another, when they had the power. See Cic. ad Quint. frat. i. 1. 11.: “Non esse autem leniores in exigendis vectigalibus Græcos quam nostros publicanos hinc intelligi potest, quod Caunii nuper, omnesque ex insulis, quæ erant ab Sulla Rhodiis attributæ, confugerunt ad Senatum, nobis ut potius vectigal quam Rhodiis penderent.” Comp. Liv. xli. 6. The ingenuity of the Greeks in the art of fiscal extortion is signalized in a long series of instances in the second book of the Economica, which, though perhaps wrongly attributed to Aristotle, may be fairly referred to as an authority on this subject.

¹ Appian, B. Mithrid. 22.: Οὐ μόνης ἔτι τῆς ἑώας θαλάσσης ἐκράτουν ἀλλὰ τῆς ἑντὸς Ἡρακλείων στηλῶν ἀπάσης.

I. Sertorius was a Sabine by birth, a Roman citizen, who had served with distinction in the armies of Marius against the Cimbri, and again with great success and reputation in Spain.¹ In the civil war he attached himself to the popular party, and enjoyed a share in the government with Marius and Cinna. His moderation and disinterested patriotism contrasted advantageously with the selfish principles of his colleagues; his name was untainted with the guilt of their proscriptions. After their deaths he despaired of obstructing the triumph of the oligarchy under Sulla, and having no confidence in the character of the younger Marius, he abandoned the defence of the popular cause², and retired into Spain. The harassed provincials, who seem to have been previously attached to him, received him as a deliverer from the tyranny of the proconsular government, which now became identified with the rule of Sulla and the nobility. But the energy with which the dictator proceeded to quell their insurrection was irresistible. The rude barbarians were unable to face his veteran legions, and Sertorius fled precipitately to New Carthage, and thence crossed to Africa. For a short time the Iberian provinces returned to their obedience, while their champion flitted from place to place, attempting various combinations against the dominant party, but without success. Proscribed and banished from Rome, he proposed to sail for the far-famed islands of the west, and establish his sovereignty in the

Revolt of the Spanish provinces in combination with the remnant of the Marian party.
A. U. 673.
B. C. 81.
Sertorius.

¹ Plutarch's life of Sertorius, to which the reader is referred, is one of his most interesting biographies. The character of the hero is perhaps the most romantic in all Roman history, and the traits of humanity and natural feeling which distinguish it are such as the mild philosopher most loved to paint.

² Plut. Sertor. 6.: Παντάπασιν ἀπογνοὺς τὴν πόλην ἔρμησεν εἰς Ἰεπιαν.

paradise of Grecian legend.¹ But a native between rival pretenders to the throne of Mætania tempted him to remain on the continent Africa, where he met and defeated a Roman army under one of Sulla's lieutenants. The old sentiment of party animosity thus flattered, he gladly listened to an invitation from the Lusitanians to lead a revolution against the Roman power. The cause of oligarchy in Spain was entrusted to the care of Metellus, now aged and unfit to cope with a vigorous antagonist; moreover, the retirement of Sulla so deprived the Romans of the soul which used to animate their exertions. By successive victories nearly the whole of the peninsula was wrested from the armies of the republic², and acknowledged the chieftainship of the hero of the west. The sway of Sertorius was studiously mild and conciliatory. His views were comprehensive, and not content with his present elevation, he looked forward to the establishment of a permanent sovereignty. He detained the children of the nobles as hostages for their fidelity; but at the same time he educated them in Roman arts and manners, and proposed to breed up a generation which should understand and wield the principles of enlightened government. His military force was now strengthened by the arrival of some veteran troops of the Italian party, who had compelled the general, Perperna, to lead them over to him. His camp became the resort of fugitives from Rome whose object was to renew the old civil contest on more favourable field. From this moment the designs of Sertorius seem to have undergone a change.

¹ Plut. Sertor. 9. : Ταῦθ' δὲ Σερτώριος ἀκούσας ἔρωτα θαυμαστὸν ἔσχε οἰκῆσαι τὰς νῆσους καὶ ζῆν ἐν ἡσυχίᾳ, τυραννίδος ἀπαλλαγεῖς καὶ πολέμῳ ἀπάντων.

² Liv. Epit. xc. : "L. Manlius, proconsul, et M. Domitius, legatus ab Herculeio quaestore victi sunt." Comp. Flor. iii. 22.; Oros. v. 23. Plut. Sertor. 12.

He surrounded himself with the nucleus of a new senate from among his Roman adherents ; he aimed at a triumphant return to the imperial city, together with the restoration of his party and their principles, and he began to treat his Iberian followers rather as faithful allies than as his adopted countrymen. Accordingly, when Mithridates sent ambassadors to him to negotiate a combined attack upon Italy and a partition of her provinces (for Rome, he said, cannot withstand the union of the new Pyrrhus with the new Hannibal) Sertorius haughtily rejected his alliance, and declared he would never allow a barbarian to possess an inch of Roman territory, beyond Bithynia and Cappadocia, miserable countries which had always been ruled by kings, and the sovereignty of which he cared not to dispute.¹

While contemplating these ultimate objects, Sertorius continued to maintain his position against Cnaeus Pompeius, who now shared with Metellus the command of the Roman armies. Though a far abler general than his colleague, and though successful in various engagements with his enemy's lieutenants, Pompeius was baffled by the address and vigilance of a chieftain who compensated for his deficiency in disciplined troops, by availing himself of the genius of his native allies for irregular warfare.² There existed also a jealousy between the Roman commanders, and Pompeius suffered a severe check in hastening to give

Contest between Ser-torius and
Pompeius.

¹ Mithridates, according to Plutarch, was content to furnish Sertorius with 3000 talents and 40 ships, in return for this empty acknowledgment of his claim to Bithynia and Cappadocia. The circumstantial account which this writer gives of the whole transaction seems more worthy of credit than Appian's loose assertion that Sertorius surrendered to Mithridates the whole of the Roman province of Asia. Plut. Sertor. 23, 24.; Appian, B.M. 68.

² Plut. Pomp. 19. : Διέκοπτε γάρ αὐτοὺς καὶ διστη ποικίλος ἀν δ πολέμιος, καὶ δεινὸς ἐν βραχεῖ πολλαχοῦ περιφανῆναι, καὶ μεταγαγεῖν ἀπ' ἄλλων εἰς ἄλλους ἀγῶνας.

battle before the arrival of Metellus, who eventually saved him from total rout. If the old woman had not come up, said Sertorius, I would have whipped this stripling back to Rome. The two generals could not long maintain the field against an enemy who possessed all the communications of the country, and the skill to avail himself of them. Metellus was compelled to retire into Gaul to recruit his forces, while Pompeius took up a defensible position in the country of the Vaccæi, and addressed urgent letters to the senate for further supplies.¹

Death of Sertorius.
The revolt quelled by Pompeius.
A. U. 682.
B. C. 72. The influence which Sertorius acquired over the Iberians was unbounded. When, with their usual fickleness and mutual distrust, some tribes were inclined to return to their obedience to Rome, he confirmed their fidelity to himself by playing upon their imaginations. He trained a milk-white hind to follow and caress him like a dog, and pretended that it was a gift of Diana, and his familiar counsellor and protectress.² The artifices he used, if we may believe the popular tales, to revive the confidence of his followers by means of this creature, were an ordinary kind of imposture; but it is pleasing to trace, in the fondness he showed for a favourite animal, the tenderness and humanity for which he was conspicuous in a ferocious age, and which, it was said, impelled him to offer more than once to relinquish the contest, that he might again visit his mother, who was still living a widow and childless in Rome.³ It is with pain, however, that we remark, on his part, one act at least of savage treachery. Jealousies arose between his Roman and his native adherents, he was threatened with the desertion of his Iberian nobility, and in a moment of anger or alarm he caused the massacre of their children whom he had retained as hostages. This deed, while it sullied his fame, could not fail to ruin his fortunes. His lieutenant Perperna intrigued against him, and in the midst of the dissensions spreading in the camp, was enabled to assassinate him with impunity.¹ The traitor assumed his victim's place at the head of the allied armies, but their strength was daily weakened by the desertion of the Iberians. From this moment the success of the arms of Rome, ever patient and vigilant, was no longer doubtful. Perperna was defeated and taken in the first engagement, and vainly attempted to avert his merited punishment, by disclosing his adherents in the city. Pompeius, out of generosity or policy, refused to inspect the list.² Perperna was put to death and his forces entirely broken up, the barbarians submitting once more to the dominion which they had so nearly succeeded in overthrowing.

¹ Sallust, Ep. Pomp. Fr. Hist. iii. 4.

² Plut. Sertor. 11.; Aul. Gell. xv. 22.

³ Plut. Sertor. 22.: Καὶ γὰρ ἦν φιλόπατρις καὶ πολὺν ἔχων Ἰμερյον τοῦ κατελθεῖν. . . . ἐν δὲ ταῖς νίκαις διεπέμπετο πρὸς Μέτελλον καὶ πρὸς Πομπήιον, ἔτοιμος δὲν τὰ ὅπλα καταβέσθαι καὶ βιοῦν ιδιώτης καθόδου τυχών. . . . λέγεται δὲ οὐχ ἥκιστα τῆς πατρίδος ἐπιθυμεῖν διὰ τὴν μητέρα τραφεῖς ὀρφανὸς ὑπ' αὐτῇ καὶ τὸ σύμπαν ἀνακείμενος ἐκείνη.

II. The long struggle of Mithridates, king of Pontus, with the Roman power began with his attempts to gain possession of the neighbouring regions of Bithynia and Cappadocia, which it had taken under its protection. The success with which his arms were crowned encouraged him to carry war into the territories of the republic in Asia Minor; and throughout those districts the people were so well disposed towards him that he was enabled to relieve them, at least for a moment, from the yoke of the foreigner.³

Contest of Mithridates
with Rome.
His cause viewed with favour by the provin-
cials in the East.

¹ Plut. Sertor. 26. ; Vell. ii. 30. ; Liv. Epit. xcv. ; Oros. v. 23.

² Plut. Pomp. 20.

³ This appears incidentally from Appian's narrative, B.M. 20, 21, 22, 28. He says expressly in one place: ⁷Ω καὶ μάλιστα δῆλον ἐγένετο τὴν Ἀσίαν οὐ φόβει Μιθριδάτου μᾶλλον η μίσει Ῥωμαίων τοιάδε ἐσ αὐτοῦς ἐργάσασθαι. The clemency which the barbarian conqueror showed to the vanquished indicates that he came rather as a deliverer than an

The enthusiasm with which he was received marks the excessive hatred that yoke had inspired. It is evident that even the capricious tyranny of Oriental despotism was preferred to all the benefits of European civilization, blighted as they were by the systematic rapacity of the Roman governors. The character of the great king of Pontus has come down to us laden with all the crimes his rivals' malevolence could fasten upon it; and in estimating it we must never forget that the sources from whence our historians drew their information were the narratives of unscrupulous foes. We know of no native documents which they could have consulted, and the memoirs of Sulla himself, the personal opponent of Mithridates, were doubtless deemed by the Romans the most authentic records of the contest between them. We have, however, too many proofs of the malignity of their writers to pay any respect to their estimate of the character of their enemies. The abilities which the Eastern despot exhibited may justly raise a prejudice in his favour; and when we consider in addition the magnanimity he repeatedly displayed, we shall be the more inclined to look for other explanations of the crimes imputed to him than the natural barbarity to which our authorities complacently refer them. The massacre of the Roman settlers throughout their Asiatic possessions, which followed upon the success of Mithenemy. Velleius excuses the readiness with which the Athenians received the lieutenant of Mithridates (ii. 23.); but Tacitus brands them as allies of the enemy of Rome, "Mithridatis adversus Sullam socios." (Ann. ii. 55.)

² This is strongly expressed in the speech of Mithridates (Justin, xxxviii. 7.), where he makes a direct appeal to the passions of the provincials: "Tantumque me avida exspectet Asia ut etiam vocibus vocet: adeo illis odium Romanorum incussit rapacitas proconsulm, sectio publicanorum, calumniæ litium." Compare Pliny's remark on the infamous character his countrymen had acquired, when speaking of the death of Aquilius, down whose throat molten gold was poured by order of Mithridates. (Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 3.)

ridates, is more likely to have been an act of national vengeance than the execution, as the historians represent it, of a tyrant's mandate.¹

The triumphs of the king of Pontus were not limited to Asia. In Greece the same pre-disposing cause produced similar effects, and almost the whole of that country was wrested from the Romans with equal ease and rapidity. Sulla it is true recovered these provinces after many desperate engagements: but the hostility of the natives, the result of mis-government, had been amply manifested, and not less the precariousness of the tenure by which their obedience was maintained. Sulla pursued his victorious career into Asia, and compelled the enemy to accept terms by which the whole of his conquests were wrung from his grasp. The provinces were again subjected to their former servitude. It seems, even from the accounts of the Romans themselves, that during the years that followed, while Sulla was enjoying his supremacy in Rome, the generals to whom the defence of the Asiatic frontier was committed acted with much perfidy in their transactions with Mithridates, trying for their own glory or emolument, to provoke him again to war.² It was not however till after the dictator's death that the contest was actually renewed. Lucullus now assumed the command in Asia, and he alone perceived the

Attempt of Lucullus to reform the provincial administration: not supported by
Pompeius.

A. U. 670.
B. C. 81.

A. U. 680.
B. C. 74.

¹ It is worth observing, as an illustration of the carelessness of the Romans in reporting groundless calumnies, that Plutarch (Pomp. 37.), speaking of this very subject, mentions Theophanes, a literary contemporary of Cicero, as having asserted that Pompeius discovered among the papers of Mithridates a letter from a certain Rutilius, urging him to the perpetration of this massacre, whereas it appears incidentally from a passage of Cicero (pro Rabir. Post. 10.), that it was only by a stratagem that Rutilius himself escaped being made a victim.

² App. B.M. 64. : Μουρήνας μὲν . . . πόλεμον ἀφορμὰς ἡρεσχέλει δι' ἐπιθυμίαν θριάμβου.

real weakness of the republic and strove to apply a remedy. The publicani or farmers of the revenue had redoubled their exactions to acquit their obligation to defray the expenses of Sulla's campaigns. The new proconsul took measures to relieve the provincials from the fresh burdens imposed upon them on this account¹; at the same time he began a series of administrative reforms, and sought to beguile the disaffection of the natives with

^{A.U. 688.} ^{B.C. 68.} hopes of a milder servitude. But before he could develope his new system, the armies of Mithridates again appeared in the field, and the people rose to receive him with all their former alacrity. Lucullus strove in vain to repress the impatience of his officers, who despised his prudential measures, and were eager to oppose force to force. The arms of the republic sustained some partial losses; these were magnified perhaps by the classes interested in provincial oppression, till the Senate began to murmur against the Fabian policy of their general. Though he obtained eminent successes, and restored the domination of Rome upon a more solid footing than before, he was charged with delaying, for personal objects, the consummation of his victories, and finally superseded in his command.

^{A.U. 688.} ^{B.C. 66.} The brilliant and decisive operations of Pompeius, to whom the conduct of the war was next intrusted, might seem to justify his predecessor's disgrace. But if Pompeius had greater military talents than Lucullus, or if his influence over a soldiery demoralized by alternate rout and plunder was more efficient for the restoration of discipline, the views of the other were certainly both nobler and wiser. The victor after all owed his triumph as much to the exhaustion of the enemy as to his own prowess; having gained the laurels which it was his ambition to secure, he declined at least to risk the favour of the Roman nobles by checking their career of extortion abroad.

¹ Plut. Lucull. 20. 23.

III. The great traffic which flourished for centuries between Greece, Egypt, and Syria, presented a brilliant lure to the habits of piracy which have prevailed in those seas from the earliest times. The father of history traces the origin of European and Asiatic hostility to the predatory enterprises of lawless adventurers.¹ Such is the natural configuration of the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor, and their intermediate islands, that this plague of piracy has never been thoroughly eradicated from their waters.² The sea-line of either continent is broken by innumerable bays and creeks, and bristles with projecting headlands; in such regions the science of navigation requires the aid of minute local knowledge. The interior of the country is also generally difficult of access; precipitous mountains alternate with deep valleys; here and there only a broader expanse is opened by a river of more than usual volume. Its population congregated, even in the best times, in spots of isolated fertility, large tracts of impassable mountain intervening between them. Under such circumstances, the recesses of every bay formed retreats for piratical adventurers, in which to repair their vessels, enjoy their booty, and riot away the intervals of repose. The policy of the Romans did not allow the provincials to maintain an effective military force to destroy these nests of marauders; during the Mithridatic war the coasts of Greece and

Origin of the Cilician piratical confederation.

¹ Herod. i. init.; comp. Thuc. i. 5.

² Compare Mr. Finlay's intelligent work on Greece under the Romans, p. 38.: "It is said that the piracies committed during the late revolutionary war contributed quite as much as the humanity of the allies to the signature of the treaty of the 6th of July, 1827, and to the foundation of a German monarchy in Greece."

Ionia swarmed with them; but it was through the policy of the king of Pontus that Cilicia became their principal stronghold. Despairing of ultimate success, he determined, it was said¹, to leave a sting rankling in the vitals of the republic. With this view, having driven in the feeble outposts of the Roman power, he encouraged the piratical hordes of the eastern seas to collect on the coast of Cilicia.² Here they established their docks, arsenals, and magazines: here there grew up an organized system of rapine and defiance, a fleet, a nation and perhaps a government of pirates.

The rise of such a power, not only menacing individual life and property, but obstructing the communications and clipping the revenues of states, shows how inefficient the Roman government abroad must have been, and how alienated the affections of

It flourishes from the inefficiency
of the provincial government, and the disaffection of the provinces.

the natives who did not shake off the marauders from their coasts.³ Meanwhile, the needy and oppressed, whoever had suffered from the scourge of war or from the rapacity of a foreign official, the most adventurous, at least, and energetic among them, contributed to swell the numbers of this pirate state.⁴ The commerce between Italy, Greece, Syria and Egypt, was in a great measure an interchange of necessaries, which war and even anarchy could not exterminate. Year after year whole fleets

¹ Appian, B.M. 92: Μιθριδάτης, ὅτε πρῶτον Ῥωμαίοις ἐπολέμει καὶ τῆς Ἀσίας ἐκράτει, Σύλλα περὶ τὴν Ἑλλάδα πονουμένου, ἡγούμενος οὐκ ἐς πολὺ καθέξειν τῆς Ἀσίας, τά τε ἄλλα πάντα ἐλυμαίνετο, καὶ ἐς τὴν Ἀδάσσαν πειρατὰς καθῆκεν.

² Appian, L.c.: Ναῦς τε καὶ ὅπλα πάντα ἐτεκταίνοντο μάλιστα περὶ τὴν τραχεῖαν λεγομένην Κιλικίαν, ἦν κοινὸν σφῶν ὑφορμον ἡ στρατόπεδον ἐτίθεντο εἶναι.

³ Sulla and Lucullus restored the Roman government in Cilicia, but made no impression upon the piratical establishments on the coast.

⁴ Plut. (Pomp. 24.) says that piracy began to be embarked in as a sphere of honourable enterprize by men of wealth and station: 'Ος καὶ δόξαν τινὰ καὶ φιλοτιμίαν τοῦ ἔργου φέροντος of merchant vessels, with all their passengers and cargoes, fell into the hands of the corsairs. Such were the power and audacity of these restless adventurers, that they often dashed as far as sixty miles inland, and carried off not only plunder, but the inhabitants of towns and villas.¹ From the wealthy they exacted ransoms; the bold and the desperate they enlisted in their own service; some they murdered in mere wanton cruelty, others on purpose to strike terror into friends and foes, and draw closer the bonds of their confederacy. They formed stations and settlements throughout the Mediterranean. It was on the coast of Spain that Sertorius fell in with a fleet of Cilician privateers, and obtained their assistance. Another squadron treated with the foes of the republic in the straits of Messana.² Four hundred cities, according to Plutarch³, fell into their hands; they possessed a thousand vessels; their pride and audacity, the splendour of their equipments, and their insolent ostentation, were more galling to the Romans than even their violence.⁴ Many of the principal temples, the treasuries of the Greek communities, which had escaped the cupidity of so many conquerors, were plundered by these unscrupulous robbers. In some places they established within their walls the rites of Mithras and secret Oriental mysteries, as if they wished to defy the religion no less than the civilization of Europe. But most of all they delighted in torturing and de-

¹ Antonia, the daughter of the orator M. Antonius, was seized by these pirates on a high road in Italy and ransomed at great cost. (Plut. l. c.)

² Plut. Crass. 10.

³ Plut. Pomp. 24.

⁴ Cicero (pro Leg. Manil. 12.) enumerates some of their principal exploits:—The seizure of Cnidos, Colophon and Samos; the sack of Caieta; insults and injuries inflicted within the harbours of Ostia and Misenum; the Roman fleet shut up in Brundisium; the capture of two Roman prætors. “Etiam Appia via jam carebamus.” Comp. App. B.M. 98. Both Julius Cæsar and P. Clodius fell, as we shall hereafter see, into their hands.

stroying citizens of the republic, against which their hatred was chiefly concentrated.

The honour, if not the security, of the common-

Reduction of the pirates by Pompeius.
A.U. 687.
B.C. 67.

wealth demanded the thorough suppression of this growing evil. Murena, and after him Servilius Isauricus, while holding commands in Asia, had attempted to check it without success. But the republic had the maritime force of all its allies at its disposal: to marshal it with effect required consummate ability. Pompeius, to whom this task was committed, distributed his armament in three divisions so as to sweep the whole of the Mediterranean, and surprised the world by reducing the squadrons of the pirates, together with their strongholds in Cilicia, within the space of three months. He effected his purpose, indeed, as much by negotiation as by force. He admitted the pretensions of the marauders to the dignity of a nation¹, not treating them as outlaws, but condescending to settle many of them in colonies both in Greece and Asia. As a memorial of the exploit he changed to Pompeiopolis the name of Soli, which he rebuilt for their occupation.²

These accounts may suffice to show the detestation

The Italians,
on the other hand, are conciliated by their comprehension in the Roman state. They lend no countenance to the movements of Lepidus and Brutus.
A.U. 677.
B.C. 77.

in which the Roman government was held throughout the provinces. We see the natives ready everywhere to throw themselves headlong into any enterprize that seems to menace the fortunes of the republic. We see how passively they regard the rise of a hostile power, even where they are themselves the first to suffer from

¹ App. B.M. 92.: Βασιλεῦσι δ' ἡδη καὶ πυράννοις η στρατοπέδοις μεγάλοις ἑαυτοὺς δροιοῦντες. Velleius discovers to us, by an incidental expression, that the Romans were jealous of this condescension: "Sunt qui hoc carpant." (ii. 32.) Compare the reluctance of Tiberius to treat with Tacfarinas as a hostis. (Tac. Ann. iii. 73.)

² App. B.M. 97.; Plut. Pomp. 28.; Strabo. xiv. 5.

it. Equally harassed, whether in war or in peace, their distress drives them to despair; they break their ties with society, and plunder even the nations whom they avenge. The energy with which the Romans combated and triumphed over this mass of resistance strikes us with wonder and awe. Their hands were nerved with the strength which the incorporation of the Italians supplied to them. Even within the limits of the peninsula the remembrance of the late wars might rankle among various communities; but the sense of their new dignity, and the enjoyment even of their limited share of power, subdued these latent animosities. The advance from municipal distinction to the highest honours of the metropolis was still rare and difficult; but many of the most lucrative posts were open to the claims of the Italians. Their ablest men flocked to Rome in quest of fame and preferment, of which they obtained an ample share through numerous channels. Enrolled among the Roman knights, they served in the administration of the provinces, or, at the head of legions, cohorts and centuries, rifled the temples of Asia and the fastnesses of Gaul and Spain. The increase of wealth at Rome could not fail to overflow upon the cities of the peninsula. The colonists of Sulla disgorged, in the retirement of their Sabine or Etruscan farms, the plunder of their distant campaigns; the nobles of the capital covered ample districts with villas and gardens; and the ostentation of luxury allured and charmed, even where the substance of wealth was wanting. Accordingly both fear and interest combined to dissuade them from hazarding again the chances of war with Rome. When M. Æmilius Lepidus, the chief of the popular party, and consul upon the abdication of the dictatorship by Sulla, attempted to revive the struggle of factions, and raise himself to a similar supremacy, the Italians held aloof from his cause.¹ Defeated in his rash enterprise, and driven beyond the seas, he perished of shame and sickness in Sardinia.² M. Junius Brutus, who embarked upon a similar adventure, was shut up in Mutina, and there taken and put to death.³

Nevertheless the seeds of disturbance were rife even in Italy among the classes of society to which the rights and privlieges of humanity were denied. The gladiatorial shows had already begun to form the great national diversion of the Romans. Slaves, captives and criminals were the ordinary victims of this barbarous passion; though freemen, and even citizens, sometimes fought for wages in the arena. It happened that a numerous troop of gladiators was maintained at Capua by one Batiatus, to be let out, according to the custom of the time, on occasions of public entertainment. These men at least were not voluntary combatants; they plotted to escape; but seventy-eight only out of the number succeeded in breaking prison.⁴ The fugitives began by seizing upon the spits and other implements in the house of a cook; thus armed they attacked and plundered on the road a large consignment of gladiatorial weapons. They took refuge, it is said, in the first instance in the then extinct crater of Vesuvius, and soon made themselves masters of a neighbouring fortress. When they proceeded to elect a commander their choice

Revolt of the gladiators under Spartacus Supported by multitudes of the dis-content in Italy, but quelled, because not countenanced
by the Italian states.
A. U. 681.
B. C. 73.

¹ Sallust says: "Etruria atque omnes reliquæ belli arrectæ" (Fragn. Hist. i. 14.); but the Etrurians were his only allies, and their ardour was only momentary.

² Appian, B. C. i. 109.; Florus, iii. 23.: "Ibi morbo et pœnitentia interuit."

³ Plut. Pomp. 16.

⁴ Plut. Crass. 8—12.; Appian, B. C. i. 116—121. Florus, iii. 20., states the number at thirty.

fell upon Spartacus¹, a Thracian by birth, a man of remarkable strength and courage, and endowed with a mildness as well as sagacity of character above his condition. The first success of the insurgents in the field was in combat with the troops which sallied forth from Capua to check their revolt. This victory supplied them with the arms of a regular soldiery, for which they gladly exchanged their own imperfect equipments. More confident in themselves, and with increasing numbers, they met and defeated a force of 3000 men under C. Clodius, and were now daily joined by bands of fugitive slaves and outlawed marauders.² In the course of three years, during which Spartacus continued to make head against the power of the republic, the numbers of his armies are successively estimated at 40,000, 70,000, and 100,000 men. At one time he actually held possession of the southern provinces of the peninsula; he sacked some of the principal cities in Campania, and pillaged the farms and villas of the Sabine mountains.³ In the field he obtained brilliant victories over Cassinius and the prætor Varinius; yet he received no public support from the Italian communities. The Samnite and the Marsian shrank with horror from a revolt of slaves and brigands. At the height of his success he was not deceived as to his real weakness, and urged his followers to effect their escape across the Alps, and betake themselves to their own homes in Gaul and Thrace, to which countries most of them belonged.⁴

¹ It appears that he had deserted from the army, been retaken, and sold into slavery; if at least we may attach any credit to the violent language of Florus: “De stipendiario Thrace miles, de milite desertor, inde latro, dein in honore virium gladiator.” (Flor. l. c.)

² The shepherds of the Apulian mountains were a lawless and desperate class of men, ready to join in any insurrectionary enterprise. Comp. Ascon. in Orat. in Tog. Cand. p. 88. Orell.

³ Horace, Od. iii. 14., alludes to local traditions: “Spartacum si quæ potuit vagantem fallere testa.”

⁴ Plut. Crass. 8. : “Ων οἱ πολλοὶ Γαλάται καὶ Θράκες.” Crixus and Cenomaus, the principal leaders next to Spartacus, were both Gauls

But the plunder of all Italy seemed within their reach, and was too tempting to be relinquished in the first flush of victory. The senate was now seriously alarmed, and sent the two consuls, Gellius and Lentulus, with ampler forces to confront the public enemy.¹ The danger had not even yet reached its height: both the consuls were ignominiously defeated. They were deposed from their commands, and Crassus, the most eminent of the citizens, was appointed to continue the war. Meanwhile dissensions arose in the horde itself; parties separated from the main body, and were cut off in detail. The legions of the republic, numerous and well-appointed, closed in upon the disorganized stragglers. Retracing his steps from the north of Italy Spartacus now contemplated transporting his followers into Sicily, and there reviving the servile war which within a quarter of a century had set that island in a blaze. A fleet of Cilician privateers lay off Rhegium, and with these bitter foes of Rome the rebel chief treated for a passage across the straits. But they, impolitic no less than faithless, secured the stipulated price, and sailed away without performing their agreement.² Crassus was now in full pursuit of the insurgents, whom he drove into the town of Rhegium, and there blockaded. By a skilful manœuvre Spartacus made his escape, but only with a portion of his forces; this, however, was enough to terrify his adversary, who feared that the enemy would outstrip him, and pounce upon Rome itself before he could be overtaken. Crassus entreated the senate to recall to its defence Lucullus from Asia, and Pompeius from Spain; again, repenting of having invited his rivals to share, perhaps to rob him of the honours of the war, he redoubled his efforts to bring it to a close before their arrival.¹ But Spartacus was destitute of means to attack the capital, and the Italian states continued immovable. He defended himself with obstinate bravery; but after alternate victories and defeats, he was slain in a final and decisive battle. The remnant of his followers was exterminated by Pompeius, who arrived in time to put the finishing stroke to the war, and to reap, from the partiality of his countrymen, a disproportioned share of the reward. Crassus lavished upon the multitude one-tenth of his immense wealth; he feasted them at ten thousand tables, and fed the citizens at free cost for three months.² But Pompeius alone they regarded as their preserver; in him their gratitude wholly centered; and it was only through his assistance that Crassus obtained a share in the consulship.

Eutrop. vi. 7.; Oros. v. 24. Liv. (Epit. xcvi.) speaks of a large body of the fugitives as mostly Germans and Gauls.

¹ Lucan, a faithful depositary of the traditions of the old oligarchical government, dignifies him with the appellation of hostis, or foreign foe: "Ut simili causa caderes qua Spartacus hostis," ii. 554.

² Plut. Crass. 10.

A. U. 684.
B. C. 70.

The frightful corruption of the Roman government in the provinces was symptomatic of the general relaxation of public morality at home. On turning our eyes to the great metropolis from whence this stream of profligacy issued, we find every act of its senate, its comitia and its forum, marked with the same stain of selfishness and venality. The senate retained with a convulsive grasp every privilege which Sulla had won for it; the judicia, which he had wrested from the knights and appropriated exclusively to the highest order in the state, were shameless alike in their partiality and corruption.³ The favour of the people was sought and

Corruption of the Roman government at home; venality and violence displayed at the elections.

¹ Appian, B.C. i. 120.

² Plut. Crass. 12.

³ Cicero allows that the venality of the judicées, who presided at the quaestiones perpetuae, permanent tribunals for inquiring into political or other specified offences, cast a stigma upon the whole order.

“ Totus ordo paucorum improbitate et audacia premitur, et urgetur gained by profuse largesses ; the means of seduction allowed by law, such as the covert bribery of shows and festivals, were used openly and boldly ; while others which were expressly interdicted, such as the direct proffer of money, were practised not less lavishly in the polling booths, where the restraint of the ballot was wholly ineffectual. Not unfrequently mere violence took the place of bribery : disturbances were purposely created ; mobs were formed and drilled, and battles ensued. In the confusion the consuls interfered, and broke up the proceedings. The great public magistracies were left vacant for many months, from the impossibility of conducting the elections with even a show of legitimate order.

Dissolute character of the mass of the free urban population.
 Remains of the ancient parsimonious spirit of the Romans.
 Moral superiority of the knights to the senators.
 Growth of a middle class.

 It has already been shown that a large portion of the urban population whom the nobles thus systematically debauched, were no better than a needy rabble, dissolute in morals, and destitute of any sense of national honour. The ready market offered for their votes was attractive to the lowest and vilest of the Italians, and the mob of the comitia was swelled by the worst class of the new citizens. Too proud to work where labour was the mark of the slave, a multitude of free men, without occupation or social position, were content to subsist in idleness upon the annual sale of their prerogative, and presented ready instruments for any political adventurer who promised either present pay or prospective rapine. But the Romans had a natural genius for the arts by which money is made and accumulated. The cautious and frugal habits of the infamia judiciorum." (I. In Verr. 12.) In another place, warming with his subject, he brands the judicia of the senate as regia dominatio. (II. In Verr. v. 68.)

middle orders in a former age of the republic still survived in that class of the commonalty to which the equestrian families belonged, who had always formed the strength of the Marian party. This was the class which had suffered most in the civil wars. As the foe and rival of the senate, it had been decimated and almost crushed by the massacres and proscriptions of Sulla. The restoration, however, of domestic peace was soon followed by the revival of its fortunes. The nobility struggled in vain to keep it in the state of depression to which it had been reduced. Its members, too, had their family recollections. Their modest patrimonies gave them an hereditary interest in peace and order. They were educated and intelligent, and knew the power which these advantages conferred. The making of money was their first object: to this the bent of their dispositions instinctively impelled them; and the circumstances of the state, overflowing with the wealth poured in from the provinces, gave them a great advantage over their rivals, whose political necessities required them year by year to scatter their fortunes among the mob. This class consisted, 1. Of those who attached themselves to the great families, and hung upon their favours and patronage, whether in the forum, the provinces, or the camp: 2. Of those who, in spite of the ancient prejudices against commerce, and the arts and sciences of polished society, engaged with all their energy in those lucrative pursuits, and were not ashamed of ministering to the growing taste for luxury and refinement¹: 3. Of the government officials, a class hitherto in the infancy of its development, but one which the gradual progress of uniformity and system in the administration was slowly raising into an important body.¹ It became evident to the clear-sighted politician that this was the order in which the real strength of the nation lay, and that it was this moneied aristocracy which must eventually dispose of the government. The patriotic statesmen might hope through their influence to place the commonwealth upon a new and permanent basis; the selfish adventurer might combine with him to advance their interests, with the hope of forging them into instruments for his own ends. The course of this history will show how the principal leaders of party leaned successively upon the support of this body, and how important was the part it played in the conversion of the republic to a monarchical form of government. The rise of this middle class, hostile to both the higher and lower, and resolved to control them equally, exerted from within an active influence upon that revolution of affairs. One further glance at the provinces will reveal to us a second force co-operating from without, and destined to form the other main support of the imperial Colossus.

¹ Cic. de Off. i. 42., ii. in Verr. v. 18.; Liv. xxi. 63.: “Quæstus omnis patribus indecorus visus.”

The legal rights of the Roman citizen were of two

Fiscal immunities imparted by the Roman franchise Claims of the provincials to comprehension.

kinds, social and political: the former consisted chiefly in certain immunities and privileges regarding marriage, inheritance, and the possession of property; the second secured his person from the disgrace of corporal punishment, gave him an appeal from the decision of the magistrates to the people, the exercise of the suffrage and eligibility to public offices, and an escape from sentence of death by voluntary banishment. In later times another immunity was acquired by it, of more substantial, at least of more universal, interest. The reduction of Macedonia by Æmilius Paullus, in the year 585 of the city, supplied such abundant resources to the treasury, that the public domains in the occupation of Roman proprietors were from thenceforth released from the payment of the land tax¹: and, in general, the indulgence which the state evinced to her citizens, as regarded their public contributions, perpetuated an invidious distinction between them and the inferior class of subjects. Accordingly, as the pressure fell more and more upon the provinces, the anxiety to escape from it became proportionally urgent. At the same time this anxiety on the one side was met by ample reasons of policy on the other. The diminution of the free population of Italy was the most notorious evil of the times; and it was viewed with the greater alarm, as the extension of the dominions of the state rendered the permanent augmentation of her armies indispensable.²

¹ The great mass of official writing was conducted originally by slaves or freedmen below the class of citizens. Niebuhr, Hist. of Rome, iii. 299. Engl. Trans. There can be no doubt that the unfortunate institution of slavery deprived the state of that large class of citizens, of moderate tastes and conservative tendencies, who contribute so much, as inferior dependents on government, to the stability of modern politics. But the superior officers and chiefs of department were, at least in the later periods of the republic, in the enjoyment of the complete franchise.

The progressive enlightenment of the Roman statesmen caused the constant addition of new names to the roll of citizenship. Successful generals were allowed the privilege of rewarding their adherents with this precious boon. Fidelity to the state began to constitute a claim to its immunities, which was more graciously conceded, as the benefits of incorporation were more sensibly perceived. As the people became gradually aware that the great revolution of the Social war had brought with it more good and less evil than had been anticipated, the extension of the rights of the metropolis to the distant provinces lost the character of an inconsistency and anomaly in the constitution. Local prejudices died away in the familiar contemplation of the vastness of the empire and the mutual relationship of its several members. The mind of the nation expanded to the conception of infusing unity of sentiment into a body, which was wielded by a single effort, and from a common centre. One after another there arose political crises, which demanded the combination of all the powers of the state in a single hand. The success of each experiment became an argument for its repetition, till the idea of submission to the permanent rule of one man first ceased to shock, and was finally hailed with acclamation. The monarchy was at first veiled under the old republican forms. Gradually the veil was dropped. Lastly, the theory of a republic was dismissed from men's minds, and fell into the same oblivion into which its real forces had already sunk. Under the supremacy of a single ruler all varieties of class became merged together; and when the citizens ceased to be discriminated among one another, there seemed no reason for maintaining distinctions between the constituent races of which the empire was composed.

Gradual enlightenment of the Roman statesmen. Tendency towards a general fusion of all the races of the empire.

¹ Cic. de Off. ii. 22. If this tax was reimposed in the consulship of Hirtius and Pansa, A. u. 711 (Plut. Æmil. 38.), it seems to have been merely as a temporary expedient: see Dureau de la Malle, Econ. Polit. des Romains, l. ii. c. 9. The city itself and the whole of Italy were relieved from all tolls by the laws of Metellus Nepos, in 694. Dion, xxxvii. 51.; Cic. ad Att. ii. 16.

² The most important evidence regarding this depopulation of Italy may be found at the beginning of Appian's history of the civil war. There is no subject on which there is such a complete consent of the original authorities. The discussion of its causes and effects is reserved for a future opportunity.

At the same period there arose in various quarters of the world mysterious voices, of which historians have repeated the echoes, indicating a general but undefined presentiment that an age of social or moral unity was approaching.¹ The East was roused to a fervid anticipation of the advent of some universal conqueror who should melt all mankind into a crude, inorganic mass. Accustomed from its infancy to a succession of monarchical dynasties, it was uneasy under the republican organization and individual development which followed upon the Roman conquest. It sighed for the coming of another Cyrus or Alexander. But these sounds found a responsive chord in the West also.¹ The sublime vaticinations of the Virgilian Sibyl, bringing the predictions of the Hebrew prophets home to the breasts of the Italians, foreshadowed a reign of peace, equality, and unity, whether under a political or a moral law. At last, with the birth of the monarchy, there sprang up the germ of the greatest of social revolutions, the religion of Christ. It was this dispensation which seized and developed, with intuition and energy truly divine, the latent yearnings of mankind for social combination. Its essence, from a human point of view, consisted in the doctrine of the fundamental equality of men. As it marched along, it trod under foot all prejudices of race and caste. Persecution might check the growth of its numbers, but only made its principles more conspicuous; and when it counted its converts by thousands, its unconscious disciples were already millions. I wish to trace the expansion of the Roman people, together with the development of the ideas of unity and monarchy among them, from the last days of the republic to the era of Constantine. I commence with a period when the senate still fondly imagined that the government of the world was the destined privilege of one conquering race, whose life-source was enshrined in the curia of Romulus and Camillus. The point unity. Its consummation in the political establishment of Christianity.

¹ See the well-known passages of Suetonius (Vesp. 4.) and Tacitus (Hist. v. 13.), confirmed by Joseph (B. J. vi. 5. 4.) and Zonaras (xi. 16.), referring to a lost book of Appian. Comp. Philo, de Præm. et Pœn. 16.

¹ Virg. Ecl. iv. Comp. Suet. Aug. 94.; Vell. ii. 59.; Senec. Quest. Nat. i. 2., for the prodigies and predictions which regarded the future empire of Augustus.

at which this review may appropriately terminate is the day when the civilized world received its laws and religion from the mouth of an autocrat, whose sole will transferred the seat of empire without a shock from the sacred circle of the seven hills to a village on the Bosphorus.

CHAPTER II.

Position and Policy of the Oligarchy or Senatorial Party upon the Death of Sulla.—Character of its Principal Leaders—Catullus, Lucullus, Crassus.—Pompeius, the Favourite of the Senate.—His pre-eminent Services and Rewards.—He introduces Reforms and countenances the Claims of the Equestrian Order.—He retains the Advocacy of Cicero.—Impeachment of Verres a Blow to the Oligarchical Ascendency.—Early Career of Cicero.—His Devotion to Reform.—His Elevation to the Consulship and Services to the Oligarchy.—Their Contempt for him and Jealousy of Pompeius.—Character and Influence of Cato.—General Imbecility of the Nobles, and Critical Position of the Oligarchy.

A HISTORY of the Romans under the empire, the imperium, that is, or military sovereignty, may commence with the period when Pompeius returned to Rome from the overthrow of Mithridates and the final subjugation of western Asia. This event took place in the year of the city 693, following the computation of Varro, which is most commonly received, and this date corresponds with the year 61 before the Christian era. We shall see indeed how the great commander disbanded his legions, and ostensibly surrendered the power of the sword on his entry into the city; but he confided in the terror of his name, the devotion of his veterans, and the influence he had acquired both at home and abroad by the exercise of his vast patronage, to maintain himself though unarmed in the ascendency which he affected to disclaim. The spirit moreover which had dictated the concession to him of autocratic powers in the provinces, was not less prepared to submit even within the city to the assumption of military rule. Before proceeding, however, to the narration of events, it will be necessary to review the position of political parties, between the abdication of Sulla and the era above indicated ; a period memorable for the struggle of the oligarchy to maintain the invidious supremacy restored to them by the dictator, for the patriotic efforts of some of their wisest partizans to modify the exclusiveness of their claims and enlarge the basis of their authority, and for the renewed vigour with which the popular faction, so lately prostrated, returned incessantly to the assault. The reforms by which the dictator had sought to control the future aggressions of the commons, related in the first instance to the senatorial order, the power and consideration of which he had studied to revive by supplying its thinned benches with the noblest scions of the equestrian families, and placing in its hands the sole initiation of legislative measures. The commons, mortified and insulted by this jealous enactment, were still more indignant at the restrictions Sulla placed upon their champions the tribunes, whose legislative functions he annulled, whose veto upon the proceedings of the senate he materially modified, and even whose prerogative in convening the popular assemblies he ventured to abridge. The confinement of the judicia to the senators alone was felt as a reproach and an injury ; it cut off the knights from indirect advantages which they had long enjoyed, and it exposed them to the wanton injustice of their hereditary enemies. The establishment of the dictator's military colonies had expelled vast numbers of Italian proprietors from their legitimate patrimonies, and rendered them needy and turbulent : the proscription and exile of the Marian chieftains, and the cruel law which excluded even their descendants from all public employment, rankled in the bosoms of many personages of name and influence. The provincials, as we have seen, in many quarters had formed vague expectations of admission to the Roman franchise at the hands of the popular leaders ; and those leaders themselves, against whose pretensions to civil honours the oligarchs combined with their united strength, resented the bribery and compulsion which were brought to bear upon the elections, the falsification of the auspices, the dissolution of the comitia, and the other tricks of insolent power which their opponents exerted unscrupulously against them.

Sulla's legislation in the interest of the oligarchy.

While such were the grounds and motives of the popular discontent, the loss of its great champion Sulla, in the year 675¹, had left the oligarchy without any acknowledged leader. It may be supposed that the haughty nobles, secure as they now deemed their power to be, were not displeased at their release from the domination of a military chieftain ; and, as long as they could maintain their new privileges without one, would be little disposed to submit to a second. It might be difficult, indeed, among a body so illustrious for wealth and family honours, and so well trained to public affairs, to select any one man by the influence of whose name and character the rest would be content to be guided.² If we would form to ourselves an idea of what was the number of the nobility of Rome, and upon what their influence rested, we must refer for a moment to the origin of the patrician houses, and their subdivision into families. In the earliest form of the commonwealth the patres were divided into three tribes, thirty curies, and three hundred gentes, clans or houses. The members of the oligarchy of Rome.

Composition

¹ Sulla resigned the dictatorship in the year 675, and died in 676.

² The nobility of Rome had universally more or less of a military and a forensic education ; they were hereditary jurisconsults, and for the most part were early initiated into the conduct of civil affairs. The author of the treatise De Corruptâ Eloquentiâ, says of them, “Ex his intelligi potest Cn. Pompeium et M. Crassum non viribus modo et armis, sed ingenio quoque et oratione valuisse ; Lentulos et Metellos et Luculos et Curiones, et ceterum procerum manum multum in his studiis operæ curæque posuisse ; nec quemquam illis temporibus magnam potentiam sine eloquentia consecutum.”

of these houses were connected among themselves by identity of name and community of religious rites: whether they descended originally from a single stock respectively is a debated question upon which we need not enter. At all events, we may be assured that any ideas of blood-connexion were forgotten from an early period; that the gens was replenished and multiplied by the introduction of clients and freedmen, so that its original patrician element might in time be completely absorbed in the plebeian admixture; that some houses lost their patrician status by marriages of disparagement; and that, from whatever cause, the number of the oldest houses had become reduced already within narrow limits.¹ Those

^{The great houses: the Cornelian and Æmilian.} among them, however, which continued to flourish, spread into many branches bearing the name of the parent stock, such as the Cornelian and Æmilian; and these branches were distinguished from one another by the cognomen, or surname, only. Thus, among the Cornelii were Scipios and Cinnas, Sullas and Lentuli²; while the Æmilii bore the surnames of a Lepidus, a Scaurus, or a Paullus. The plebeian houses were established on a similar principle, and were from an early period far more numerous than their rivals. The nobility consisted properly of all those who were, in legal phrase, ennobled by their ancestors having served the curule,

¹ About half a century later, in the time of Augustus, it was remarked that the number of families of the highest antiquity was not more than fifty. This, however, was after a long and bloody period of civil war, proscription, and massacre. See Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Antiq. Rom. i. 85. ἵκανδν δὲ καὶ τὸ ἀπὸ τοῦ κρατίστου γνάριμον, ἐκ δὲ τοῦ Τρωϊκοῦ τὸ ἐνγενέστατον δὴ νομιζόμενον, ἐξ οὗ καὶ γενεαὶ τινες ἔτι περιῆσαν εἰς ἐμὲ πεντήκοντα μάλιστα οἰκοι. This claim to Trojan descent was of course a mere pretence; but it would not have been popularly conceded except to families of real antiquity, such as the Julii, Sergii, and others.

² At this period the name Cornelius becomes indefinitely multiplied, in consequence of the indiscriminate admission into his own house which Sulla conceded to his soldiers and dependents.

or chief civic magistracies.¹ All such were entitled to a seat in the senate, when vacancies were supplied by the censors at each succeeding lustrum, if not personally disqualified, and provided that the number of the order, fixed by Sulla at six hundred, was not exceeded. At the period at which this history begins, the actual members of the senate may have amounted, perhaps, to five hundred.² The election which had been made by Sulla had doubtless eliminated all whose poverty rendered them unfit to participate in the privileges of an oligarchy, the influence of which depended in a great degree, upon the wealth of its individual members. The party which attached itself to this illustrious order was no doubt far more extensive, and comprised a portion at least of its rival, the equestrian, which was cajoled or bribed to its service. It was supported, moreover, by a numerous class of clients both in Rome and throughout the provinces. Even where the old social feelings attached to that connexion were forgotten, it was still maintained from consideration of the solid advantages pertaining to it. Whole cities and states placed themselves sometimes under the protection of a senatorial patron. The mass of the urban population was ready to follow the banner of a generous leader. The saying attributed to the wealthiest of the Roman aristocracy, that no man deserved to be reputed wealthy who could not maintain at his own cost three legions of soldiers, may indicate that the equipment of troops of mercenaries was not altogether unfamiliar to the great chieftains of his party. But the most direct bulwark of the oligarchy was the army of 120,000 veterans, whom Sulla had settled in Italy, conscious how insecure was the tenure of their newly-acquired possessions, and bound, as was supposed, by every motive to the cause of the magnates of the capital.

¹ The curule magistracies, so called from the chair of state, or stool, mounted with ivory, appropriated to them, were those of the consul, the prætor, the aedile, and the censor; the dictator, and his master of the horse, were also curule magistrates.

² This may be inferred from two passages in Cicero's works. In a letter to Atticus (i. 14.), he speaks of a division in a very full assembly of the Senate, when there appeared four hundred on one side and fifteen on the other. On another occasion (see the speech post reditum in Senat. 10.) the house was extremely full, and four hundred and seventeen were present. Allowance must be made for the number of those engaged abroad in the provincial administration. The censors for the year 689 had abdicated their functions without making any revision of the Senate, and the vacancies occurring since the previous lustrum had not been filled up at the period referred to.

The great offices of the state shared by a few houses. Besides the Cornelian and Æmilian, the most wide-spread, and perhaps the most illustrious, historically, of all the great Roman houses, there were several others which, from their wealth, their dignity and public estimation, were enabled almost to share among themselves the principal offices of the commonwealth. To the Cæcilian gens belonged the Metelli, subdivided into many distinct families, which were among the strongest supporters of the senatorial ascendency: to the Servilian appertained the Vatias and Ahalas: to the Scribonian the Libos and the Curios. The Claudian or Clodian house was descended from remote antiquity, and pretended to derive its origin from a mythical hero: the Sergii and Antonii claimed a Trojan ancestry: the Asinii and Annii, the Cælii and Calpurnii, the Junii and Pomponii, the Marcii and Domitii, were names conspicuous in the municipal annals of the free-state; but the Lutatian, the Licinian, the Pompeian, the Tullian, the Porcian, and, lastly, the Julian house, were rendered pre-eminently illustrious by the great warriors or statesmen who at this time represented them, whose early career and contemporary honours I shall proceed to signalize, as an introduction to the more detailed history upon which we are about to enter.

The consuls for the year 676 of the city, in which Sulla died, were M. *Æ*Emilius Lepidus and Q. Lutatius Catulus. They were raised to that elevation by the undisputed influence of the nobles in whose ranks they were both eminently conspicuous. But Lepidus, we have seen, aspired to a forbidden ascendancy. He aimed at leaping into the seat of Sulla himself; and when the nobles resisted and denounced his criminal ambition, he appealed to the passions of the Marians and Italians, and raised the standard of civil war. His colleague Catulus, on the other hand, was the most moderate and truly disinterested of all the great men of his day. The history indeed of the commonwealth presents us, perhaps, with no character which deserved more general esteem, or obtained more blameless distinction in political life. We have no evidence, however, that his talents were of the highest order. Except in crushing the feeble movement of Lepidus, he performed no military exploit. Nor was his eloquence such as could sway the turbulent democracy of the forum, or unravel the crafty intrigues of tribunes and demagogues. But he proved himself useful to his country in throwing the weight of his reputation into the scale of justice and constitutional right, and in supporting more ardent and enterprising men in the cause he deemed the best. He declaimed openly against the corruption of the tribunals and the spoliation of the provinces.¹ In the abuse of the judicia he discovered the motive and the plea for the revival of tribunitian irresponsibility, and he urged timely concession to the reasonable claims of the democracy. On the other hand, he combated the bills of Gabinius and Manilius, for

Q. Lutatius Catulus, born circa
A. U. 634.
B.C. 120.

¹ Cic. in Verr. i. 15 He said, "patres conscriptos judicia male et flagitiose tueri: quod si in rebus judicandis populi Rom. existimationi satisfacere voluissent, non tantopere homines fuisse tribunitiam potestatem desideraturos."

conferring extraordinary and dangerous powers on Pompeius. He lent all his influence also to strengthen the hands of the consul Cicero against the avowed or secret machinations of Catilina and his adherents. The people offered a marked testimony to their sense of his merits. In opposing the law of Gabinius, he had asked, Should the man perish whom we are about to invest with these successive powers, to whom shall we look to save us? The multitude with one voice exclaimed, *To Catulus himself.*¹ Accordingly he enjoyed for many years the principatus, or premiership, of the senate, the most honourable distinction of public and private excellence, which, upon his death, fell into abeyance, and was only revived, after the expiration of liberty, to swell the dignities and privileges of an emperor.

L. Licinius Lucullus was another noble of high

L. Licinius
Lucullus, born circa
A. U. 644.
B. C. 110.

character and immense wealth, whose military exploits discovered talents for command, while his administrative powers were not less conspicuous. But, though ambitious of distinction, he wanted sufficient energy to devote himself to the toils of public business, and to court popularity with a jealous and exacting party. Among the ferocious warriors of Rome, Lucullus was celebrated for his mildness and humanity: among her crafty or overbearing statesmen he was not less conspicuous for his modesty and prudence. His reforms in the government of the Asiatic provinces were unpalatable to the rulers of the state, and they requited their grudge by seizing an opportunity to remove him from his eastern command. He is accused of avarice; and it may give some colour to the charge, that he deigned to accept another appointment in Thrace, instead of returning at once, and asserting his proper ascendancy in the councils of the city. But when he did return, it was rather to enjoy his wealth in ostentatious luxury, than to enter into the current of public affairs. He gratified the people, whom he disdained to court, by the sumptuousness of his entertainments, and the liberal use he made of his galleries and gardens. Frequently appealed to by his party to cheer and protect them with the influence he thus acquired, it was from indolence rather than resentment that he seldom responded to the call. He may perhaps be ranked next to Catulus, though at a long interval, for the purity and patriotism of his motives, qualities which we shall find to have been eminently rare at that period among the corrupt aristocracy of the republic. But he had neither the pertinacity of will, nor the resolute daring, required to control the furious passions and headlong venality of a Roman faction.

¹ Cic. pro leg. Manil. 20.

Again, in the general mediocrity of talent among the highest nobility, a distinguished place was occupied by another member of the Licinian house, Marcus Crassus. This man deserves to be remarked as a genuine representative of the least attractive side of the old Roman character, which has been already referred to, namely, that shrewdness and sordid diligence in the accumulation of money which made so many of the national heroes strict domestic economists, sullied such illustrious names with the stain of usury and extortion, and impelled so many thousands of inferior note to establish themselves as traders on every coast, and incessantly repair by their influx the destruction of their countrymen in the provinces. The branch of the Licinian house to which Crassus belonged had already obtained the surname of Dives from the excessive wealth of some of its members.¹ There was none, however, of the

M. Licinius Crassus, born circa
A. U. 639.
B. C. 115.

¹ Cicero. de Off. ii. 16.

race to whom the title was so justly applicable as to the rival of Catulus and Lucullus. The name of this Marcus Crassus became in after times proverbial among his countrymen as the richest of the Romans¹; the evaluation of his treasures has been preserved, and the head grows dizzy in estimating them in the minute denominations of the national coinage.² The wealth indeed which he amassed sinks, after all, into insignificance when compared with some of the great fortunes of later times; but it must be remembered that his position compelled him to spend almost as fast as he accumulated, and there seems to have been no want of liberality in his mode of dispensing his treasures when his interest required it. But what is chiefly remarkable is, that his acquisitions were made, not by brilliant successes, though in his youth he had served Sulla with distinction; nor by glaring extortions, though he was sufficiently exact and punctual in his claims; but simply by waiting steadily upon the necessities of his friends or rivals; by buying at the cheapest and selling at the dearest moments; by the careful and judicious use of accumulating capital, as, for instance, in the education of a multitude of slaves with the view of deriving a profit from their accomplishments.³ We may conceive how, in the disordered state of private fortunes at Rome in an era of revolution, a shrewd politician might thus attach to himself a number of adherents, especially one who had no prominent vices to disgust, or brilliant talents to alarm them. Around him rallied the moneyed interests of the city, that large class who were silently and cautiously founding fortunes on the spoils of the provinces, while the great chiefs were squandering their means in largesses to the people, and wasting their time and energies in the race of preferment. He repaid their favour by exerting himself for their advancement, and combined with other liberal statesmen to restore to the knights a share in the judicia. He shewed himself active and wary in advocating the suits of wealthy delinquents: his assiduous industry supplied the place both of natural genius and early training; and his polite attentions to those whose favour he coveted might be advantageously contrasted with the pride and stiffness of his rivals.¹ Without yet aspiring to the leadership of the oligarchy, he contrived to secure a large portion of its confidence, and was at one period the principal link which continued to bind the senate and the knights together, notwithstanding their mutual jealousy and conflicting pretensions. But as he rose in the esteem of the nobles, he risked the loss of popular favour, and we have seen how little his munificence to the people would have availed him in his suit for the consulship without the aid of his more brilliant competitor.

¹ Compare Cic. ad Att. i. 4.; de Fin. iii. 22.; Sallust, Bell. Catil. 48.; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 47.; Plut. in Crass. Cæs.; Tertullian, Apolog. 11.

² His father's estates had been confiscated by the Marians, and Plutarch (Crass. 2.) states that he possessed at first only 300 talents. Before setting out on his expedition to Parthia, he estimated his substance at 7000. Pliny (H. N. l. c.) gives the sum of 200 millions of sesterces, which make about 8,300 talents. The talent is computed to equal in weight of silver about 200*l.* of our money. But these estimates are extremely uncertain, and we do not even know whether they are confined to money and bullion, or include the capital invested in slaves, houses, and lands.

³ Plut. Crass. 2.: ταῖς κοινᾶς ἀτυχίαις προσόντω τῇ μεγίστῃ χρησάμενος. Some curious modes in which he made his money are there mentioned; but the statement that he frequented fires in the city, to bid for houses

in danger from the conflagration, I regard as merely a characteristic invention. Compare in point of exaggeration Cicero's jest, in the Scholia Bobuensia, p. 347. Orelli.

¹ Cicero's description of Crassus (Paradox. vi.) is doubtless tinged with prejudice (comp. also Cic. Brut. 66.). On the other hand, Plutarch's good-natured estimate of him (Crass. 3. 7.) seems at least equally distorted.

Cnæus
Pompeius
Magnus, born
A. D. 648.
B. C. 106.

However conscious the nobles might be that their privileges demanded the fostering protection of the ablest and most successful general of the time, it was not without distrust and reluctance that they consented to court the favour of Cnæus Pompeius. This illustrious personage was the son of Pompeius Strabo, a noted captain in the previous civil wars. The name of the father was associated with many of the worst enormities of that terrible period. Though commanding in the name of the senate, he had been the object of its dislike and suspicion; and the pertinacity with which he prosecuted his own plans, independent of its direction, had marked him as dangerous and disloyal. Bred up under the auspices of a turbulent and aspiring parent, and familiarized from his childhood with the selfish projects of a rapacious soldiery, it may be supposed that schemes of personal aggrandisement opened themselves from an early period to the mind of the younger Pompeius. Sulla divined and distrusted him; but his followers were powerful, his predilections ostensibly oligarchical; every enterprize to which he was called was crowned with extraordinary success; and when, at the age of twenty-four, he returned victorious from Africa, where he had crushed the remnant of the Marians with their Numidian auxiliaries¹, the dictator hailed him with the appellation of Magnus, or the Great; and reluctantly allowed him the honour of a triumph, unexampled in so youthful a conqueror.² He soon requited this favour by combining with Catulus to repress the insurrection of Lepidus. He was not yet of proper standing to enter upon the career of civic honours, when the progress of Sertorius in Spain demanded once more the employment of his military talents. There, as we have seen, his victory was achieved rather through Perperna's treachery than by his own prowess; but the grateful senate forbore to scrutinize his merits too closely, and rewarded him with a second triumph. Henceforth, adopting him as its champion, it confided to his steady hand the prosecution of its policy in the city. Nevertheless, while it was their interest thus to flatter and caress him, the nobles looked with secret disdain upon his municipal extraction, his plebeian descent and recent nobility. The illustration of his family dated only from his father, a successful adventurer in the hazards of the civil war; and he knew that his own fortunes, like those of Pompeius Strabo, must rest upon his personal abilities rather than the love or sympathy of the dominant party. He saw, moreover, the fact, to which that party obstinately blinded itself, that its foundations were too narrow for the permanent maintenance of its power. Conscious of his own strength, he struck out a course of policy independent of the trammels in which the oligarchs would have confined him. He sought to raise up a bulwark to the commonwealth, and to the aristocracy itself, in a middle class whose interests and predilections might dispose it to control the excesses both of the populace and the nobles. This class he purposed to constitute the pedestal of his own rising fortunes. He would make himself its head to plan, and its hand, if necessary, to strike. With this view, Pompeius did not hesitate to place himself in direct opposition to the nobles on points which they deemed essential to their ascendancy. He supported the much contested measure of restoring to the knights their ancient judicial prerogative, which they continued ardently to covet, and which might contribute to relieve the nobles themselves from a weight of odium which threatened to overwhelm them. In carrying out this policy he was gradually removing the superstructure of his own fortunes from the basis of the oligarchy to that of his own personal adherents, and shifting his ground to a position in which he might defy the control of the senate.

¹ Livy, Epit. lxxxix. Eutrop. v. 9.

² The occasion on which this memorable title was conferred, has been the subject of much discussion. Drumann (Geschichte Roms nach Geschlechtern, iv. 335.), after weighing the conflicting authorities, acquiesces in Plutarch's statement (Pomp. 13.), which is followed in the text.

The restoration of the tribunitian prerogatives and of the judicia were kindred and connected measures. In his first harangue after his election to the consulship, Pompeius promised to effect both, and this declaration was received by the people with the loudest acclamations.¹ But the nobles resisted with desperation, notwithstanding the counsels of Catulus and the wisest men among them. Their courage required to be daunted by a signal exposure, and the notorious guilt of Verres, who had just returned from the spoliation of the province of Sicily, furnished an apt opportunity. The zeal and eloquence of Cicero, the most rising orator of the day, were enlisted on the side of justice and authority, and the issue of the prosecution, urged with the fervour of genius and backed by the influence of the consuls themselves, clothed the cause of the people with all the charm of success. The criminal had boasted the fruits of three years' occupation of office. Those of the first, he declared, would suffice to make his own fortune; those of the second to reward his advocates and partizans; those of the last and most abundant, to secure the suffrages of his judges. No wonder that Cicero could venture to anticipate that the provinces would soon come forward of their own accord, and pray for the repeal of the laws against malversation, since they only served to redouble the extortions of their oppressors to amass the means of corrupting the tribunals.¹ During the forty years that the knights had served on the bench of justice, common fame declared that there had been no single instance even of the suspicion of corruption: it had now become the rule rather than the exception.² It must be confessed, however, that the restoration of their prerogative, which was now about to take place, failed to restore any such golden age of judicial purity.

¹ Pompeius and Crassus were consuls A.U. 684, B.C. 70. Pseudo-Asconius, in Cæc. divin. 8. "Primus Sicinius, tribunus plebis, nec multo post Quintius, et postremo Palicanus perfecerant, ut tribunitiam potestatem populo darent consules Cn. Pompeius Magnus et M. Lici-nius Crassus." Compare Liv. Epit. xcii.; Vell. ii. 30.; Plut. Pomp. 22.

But it was not the venality of the tribunals that made the cause of injured innocence most utterly hopeless. If the judges were always to be bought, satisfaction at least, if not justice, might sometimes be attained by a wealthy complainant. The senators, whose turn it might be to come under judgment the next day themselves, guaranteed, for their own sake, the impunity of criminals of their own order. In the flagrant case, however, of the Verrine prosecution the hands of the assailant were opportunely strengthened. Both the consuls were equally intent on carrying the popular vote of condemnation. The culprit resorted to every means to postpone the trial till the next year, when a personal friend, Hortensius, would succeed to the consulship, and another, Metellus, would be the prætor to whose lot it had fallen to preside in such suits as that now pending against him.³ But Cicero's activity and adroitness defeated every artifice, and when he unites with Crassus, and engages the services of Cicero in transferring a share in the judicia to the knights.

Pompeius

¹ Cic. i. in Verr. 13, 15.

² Pseudo-Ascon. in Cæc. divin. 8. “C. Gracchus legem tulerat, ut equites Rom. judicarent. Judicaverunt per annos xxxx sine infamia. Post victor Sulla legem tulerat, ut Senatorius ordo judicaret, et judicavit per decem annos turpiter.” But Appian allows that the knights were no better than the senators. (Bell. Civ. i. 22.)

³ Cic. i. in Verr. 8. “Cum prætores designati sortirentur et M. Metello obtigisset ut is de pecuniis repetundis quæreret.”

opened the proceedings, a single preliminary oration sufficed to seal the fate of the defendant. Verres, scared by the array of influences combined against him, acknowledged his guilt by withdrawing into exile; but the accuser followed up his success by publishing the series of speeches he had prepared for delivery, in which he had detailed the black catalogue of his victim's enormities. The disgrace of these disclosures could neither be palliated nor endured, and the senate resigned a contest in which its own chief magistrates were arrayed against it. The system, of which the particular case was only an example, admitted of no defence, and the time for defiance was past. But its vices, checked perhaps for a moment by publicity, were apparently little amended by the change now effected in the constitution of the tribunals. Neither the subsequent conduct of Pompeius who reversed the reformatory measures of Lucullus in Asia, nor the general character of his colleague, to whom honour and justice were wholly indifferent, allow us to suppose that their policy was guided by a sense of justice or humanity. Public opinion continued to encourage the most open defiance of every moral obligation in dealing with the enemy in the provinces. We find Cicero, in the very next year, defending Fonteius against the complaints of the Gauls, with an audacity of statement and insinuation far transcending the common artifices of the advocate. But the knights gained by the new enactment an important step in the advancement of their interests: a political expediency was satisfied, and the middle class of citizens began to coalesce into a firm and compact body, conscious of its unity and strength.

At the same time the generous aid of Catulus and a small section of the nobles, enabled the consuls to effect a further measure of public utility. They revived the office of Censor after a long interval in which it had lain

Progress of reform:
revival of the censorship.
A. U. 684.
B. C. 70.

in abeyance, and the magistrates thereto appointed, L. Gellius Publicola and Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, undertook their functions in a fair spirit.¹ They assigned to Catulus the exalted distinction of princeps, or leader of the senate. They made moreover a rigid inquiry into the means and qualifications of the members of that body, of whom they ejected not less than sixty-four, as unworthy from their character, or incompetent from their poverty, to discharge its duties according to the intentions of antiquity. These public acts are important as indicating the temper of the times, and the growing sense of the necessity for administrative reforms; they also throw light upon the cautious and quiet policy which characterized Pompeius, who continued, while still ostensibly a leader of the oligarchy, to throw all his influence into the descending scale of popular opinion. With manners eminently bland and attractive, whenever he chose to display them, with a person of remarkable dignity and a countenance of winning sweetness, he possessed a sure means of engaging the admiration of attendants, suitors and casual visitors; but his colleagues feared, his associates distrusted him, and those he called his friends were in fact merely parasites.

Upon the expiration of his consulship Pompeius did not accept, as was usual, the government of a province. He had already attained the highest ordinary honours of the state, and pure as he was in his private conduct and moderate in his habits, the emoluments of the proconsulate offered no temptation to him. He had attained extensive influence with the legions, and his overweening reliance upon his early reputation forbade him to conceive any jealousy of Lucullus, Metellus, and the other commanders in the provinces. He remained accordingly at Rome, affecting the reserve and retirement of one who would only deign henceforward to serve the state when weaker hands had failed; but he foresaw that the perils which menaced the commonwealth must soon call him forth amidst redoubled acclamations. When Gabinius, his flatterer or his creature, proposed in the panic caused by the Cilician pirates, to confer upon him extraordinary powers, to invest him with command over all the Mediterranean coasts, and every city and territory within fifty miles from the seaboard, the senate stood aghast.¹ But the cause was not that of the senate and the nobles alone. The whole empire was frenzied with alarm, and ready to rush upon any remedy that offered. The city trembled for its daily sustenance; the government apprehended the violence of a starving mob. In spite

Reserve affected by Pompeius.
Extraordinary powers conferred upon him by the bills of Gabinius and Manilius.

¹ Cic. II. in Verr. v. 7.; Liv. Epit. xcvi.; Plut. Pomp. 22.

^{A.U. 687.} ^{B.C. 67.} of the strong dissuasions of Catulus and others, the appointment of Pompeius to this enormous command was carried by the general voice of the nation. The skill and vigour he displayed, the confidence he presently restored, the rapid influx of supplies into the capital, all seemed to mark the expediency of this political stroke. After a brief interval for making his dispositions, dividing his forces and securing the most important communications, Pompeius set sail with a well-appointed fleet for the principal resorts of his roving adversaries. In two months the wound was staunched, in six it was healed over by the establishment of the marauders in continental colonies; health and strength returned in the natural order of events.² The danger of the return in a private capacity of one who had now tasted so much of absolute power, was averted for a season by the increasing difficulties of the Mithridatic war. Lucullus was recalled, and another bill was proposed by Manilius to confer upon the champion of the republic the undivided command of the eastern provinces.¹ Again the nobles shuddered at the power they had called into existence ; again did Catulus and many more, the most prudent together with the proudest of the party, <sup>A. U. 688.

¹ Cic. pro leg. Manil.; Dion, xxxvi. 6.; Vell. ii. 31.; Liv. Epit. xcix.

² Cic. pro leg. Manil. 12. "Tantum bellum. . . . Cn. Pompeius extremâ hieme apparavit, incunte vere suscepit, mediâ aestate confecit." Plutarch reduces the period of actual hostilities to three months, Pomp. 28.: οὐκ ἐν πλειονι χρόνῳ τριῶν μηνῶν. Livy. Epit. xcix.; Florus, iii. 6., and the Auctor de Viris Illust. 77. shorten the time to forty days.

B. C. 66.</sup> resist this accumulation of honours. Pompeius was supported by the favour of the citizens, by the intrigues of his friends and creatures in the senate, by Crassus and another craftier than Crassus, who countenanced for their private ends these successive inroads upon established usage ; and he might command the spirited declamation of Cicero, who, now rising rapidly in fame and popularity, resolved at once to throw his fortunes into the wake of the great conqueror's.

Pompeius may claim perhaps the merit of discovering the necessity of widening the basis of the ruling aristocracy ; but the development which Cicero's zeal and energy gave to <sup>M. Tullius
Cicero, born
A. U. 648.
B. C. 106.</sup> this sagacious policy marks him more particularly as its patron and representative. Every circumstance combined to dispose the aspiring advocate to assert, and at the same time to qualify, the ascendancy of the Senatorial party. As a new man, the offspring of an equestrian family in the obscure country town of Arpinum, he knew that in climbing the ladder of preferment he must encounter the jealousy of the nobles, who never permitted one of his class to attain the highest civil dignities in the ordinary course. Yet a townsman of Cicero, and one of even inferior birth, had recently been raised by his political services to the enjoyment of seven consulships, and the blood of the young municipal might well be inflamed by such an example of successful self-reliance. Cicero however had none of the adventurous spirit of Marius: if ever he harboured aspirations for military renown, they were satisfied by a single campaign. But as the shocks of civil war subsided, a nobler field was opened to the accomplishments of peace, and he felt in the consciousness both of genius and industry, an earnest of brilliant success in the forum and at the bar. The heroes from whom he caught the fever of renown were neither the chieftains of sanguinary factions, nor the legists whose reforming spirit had first contested the sacred maxims of the constitution. If he abhorred the violence of a Marius or a Sulla, a Cinna or a Carbo, he was little more enamoured of the captious liberalism, for such he deemed it, of Drusus and the Gracchi. He admired and followed and hung upon the lips of the great bulwarks of legal usage who illustrated the period of his own early education, a Crassus, an Antonius, a Sulpicius, and a Scævola, the children and champions of the Roman aristocracy. By them his temper was moulded to the love of precedent and prescription. In the restoration of the popular party he could not fail to anticipate the overthrow of the ancient jurisprudence, and the discouragement of the formal studies in which he most delighted, and which he made the basis of his own practical philosophy. Doubtless it cost him a severe struggle to take the side of the reformers: but he perceived instinctively that the talents of Pompeius, all-sufficient in the field, must require in the city the co-operation of the orator and the jurist; and he hoped, by making himself necessary to the military chief of the government, to command his support in return, and scale the summit of political distinction. At the moment when the young advocate entered upon public life, the pre-eminence of the great captain, his contemporary in years, was already established. The leader of the senate, the patron of the knights, the favourite of the people, Pompeius appeared to unite all suffrages. The republic seemed to await the pressure of his hand to receive her bias and direction. Cicero felt, with unsuppressed exultation, that his services were understood by the hero of the day, and his genius he believed was appreciated by him. He trod the path of honours with a bold and confident step, and flung to the populace the treasures with which his clients repaid his eloquence ; while the consciousness of deserved prosperity added brilliancy to his wit and ardour to his generosity.

¹ Cic. pro leg. Manil.; Dion, xxxvi. 25.; Liv. Epit. c.; Vell. ii. 33.; Plutarch, Pomp. 30.

The views to which Cicero thus early devoted himself he continued to cherish through life, even while compelled at times to side with a faction which feared and resented them. He began gradually to conceive a genuine interest for the classes whose cause he advocated, perhaps we may say an affection for them, which forms one of the most pleasing features of his character. He aimed at elevating that middle class already spoken of, as a pledge of the integrity of the constitution. He laboured diligently to soften the conflicting views of the nobility and commons, of the Romans and Italians, the victors and vanquished of the civil wars. Nor was his political course warped like that of his leader Pompeius by any impatience of the restraints of law, such as might naturally arise in the breast of a military commander, nor by the criminal desire to rise above them, which the child of Strabo and the lieutenant of Sulla might be supposed to inherit. Cicero's ambition was ardent and soaring, but it was sincerely limited to acquiring the highest honours of the free state. He succeeded in attaining the consulship, and as consul he performed a service for his country as brilliant as any recorded

Cicero an advocate for reform.

in her annals. But his career of patriotism and loyal service was cut short by the jealousy of his associates and the selfishness of his early patron. Intoxicated by success, he had allowed himself to forget how unnatural and precarious his elevation really was; and assailed as he was from various quarters, his own vanity contributed in no slight degree to his fall. The nobles were willing to prove to the world the inherent weakness of any man, however splendid his abilities, who had not the legitimate basis of birth and wealth to rely on; and Pompeius selected Cicero for the victim of his ungenerous policy, when he wished to display his power and hurl defiance at the senate, yet did not venture to inflict upon it a wound which should really smart.

While Pompeius was prosecuting the war against Mithridates with all the powers assigned him by the Manilian bill, Cicero continued to advance the interests of their common policy in the city. He had already acquired a great reputation as an orator and a pleader. He could extend and confirm his political alliances by the suits he undertook to defend. He gained the attachment of some of the noblest of the senators. The cautious coldness of the oligarchy gradually warmed in favour of the clever aspirant whom all classes combined to admire. One after another the principal magistracies of the city were surrendered to his ardent solicitations. The commonwealth required indeed the services of her ablest men: it was not a time for petty jealousies and illiberal exclusions. Affairs were ripening for a crisis, which various chiefs and parties seemed to anticipate, with a view to profit by the universal confusion. Pompeius and Crassus, no less than the Marian leader Cæsar, were forecasting the results of a mutinous outbreak among the dissolute and discontented men with whom the ranks of highest birth and station abounded. The violent changes in the state which had so lately occurred, had bred up a race of men of ungoverned enmities and desperate resolutions. Public and private life had become one great gambling-booth, in which the most abrupt alternations of luck had rendered multitudes equally reckless of good or evil fortune. The constant bickerings of the rival parties had kept the sores of the recent troubles still unhealed. A thousand intrigues crossed and jostled one another in the forum, and while two great factions still confronted each other in the arenas of public strife, a chaos of conflicting passions and interests occupied the ground between them. The city, in the absence of Pompeius, was destitute of any leader of acknowledged pre-eminence. The moment seemed to have arrived when Rome and Italy might become the prey of a daring adventurer. The return of the proconsul with his legions from the east was too remote a contingency to disturb the anticipations of the unsettled heads which met in secret conclave, and divided in imagination the spoils of empire. Pompeius awaited at a distance the result of the impending commotion, not displeased perhaps at being removed from the city, where his presence would have stifled it in its birth: for he was assured that, whatever might be the immediate issue, substantial power resided in his camp, and the triumph must ultimately be his alone. But the nobles viewed with redoubled anxiety both the chance of a revolution and the means of its suppression. While they shuddered at the prospect of a sedition which might involve the city and the laws in a common destruction, they apprehended hardly less sensibly the restoration of order by the sword of a military dictator.

Apprehensions of a secret conspiracy against the government.

The chiefs of the aristocratic faction who have hitherto been mentioned, were all men of moderate and politic views, and disposed to admit of qualification and compromise in

M. Porcius
Cato, born
A. u. 89.
B. c. 95.

the claims they advanced in behalf of its ascendancy. To the mass of their own adherents, accordingly, they were all more or less objects of distrust: for the dominant class continued sternly bigoted to its own ideas, from mistaken principle no less perhaps than from selfishness, and regarded with disgust as well as apprehension every movement of its leaders which swerved from the direct assertion of its supremacy. This stubborn majority, which refused to ply either to justice or expediency, and defied both the authority of Pompeius and the blandishments of Cicero, comprised many nobles whose names will figure in the following pages: a Bibulus, a Marcellus, a Domitius will soon become individually known to us; but while we leave these personages to be pourtrayed by their own actions, there is one at least among them whose character deserves more special consideration. M. Porcius Cato was a member of a noble plebeian house, connected on all sides with the principal families of the commonwealth, and descended in the fourth generation from Cato the Censor, a name long held by the citizens in traditional veneration for probity and simplicity. Younger by a few years than any of his great political rivals, he entered upon the public stage at a somewhat later period. The absence of Pompeius in Asia first made room for him in the councils of the nobility, whose cause he embraced with more genuine ardour and devotion than any of his contemporaries. The stubbornness and fearlessness he displayed, even as a child, made a deep impression upon his relatives. He had witnessed the termination of the Social contest, and resented, as a mere boy, the compromise in which it resulted. Nevertheless, his natural humanity had revolted from the atrocities with which Sulla confirmed the domination of his party; and if he was the friend of aristocratic supremacy, he was no less devoted to what he believed to be justice.

Had his views been clearer, and his mind more susceptible of logical conclusions, he would have seen how utterly the lines he thus marked out for himself were inconsistent and irreconcileable. But his convictions were blind and unreasoning, his temper rigid and untractable; from the goodness of his heart he deserved to lead mankind, but the weakness of his head should have condemned him to follow them. Well read in books, his mind had no power to assimilate the lessons of history; a formal adherent of the Stoic philosophy, the real springs of human action were unknown to him, or disregarded by him. His gaze was fixed on the mere outside of society around him, and his disgust at the prevailing laxity of manners was as crude and inconsiderate as his admiration of the reputed severity of antiquity. He marched on foot when others rode, to mortify his associates' vanity; he turned night into day to prove that the genuine sage is independent of external circumstances; the mandates of the law he enforced with ostentatious strictness, because a ruder age had been naturally unfeeling; he was hard to his slaves because the old Romans treated them like cattle; he swallowed wine with joyless avidity to emulate the brutal recreations of his barbarous ancestors. Cato revered the name of his great-grandfather the Censor; and while he studiously formed himself upon that ancestral model, he had actually inherited a kindred disposition. But the elder Cato lived in an age which still professed at least to respect the principles of the old Roman austerity. It was against a rising generation, extravagant in its habits and speculative in its ideas, innovators both in practice and theory, that he had marshalled the antique prejudices of the nation. Unsuccessful as he was, he had still preserved the reverence of the people, and bequeathed an honoured name to his descendants. His successor applied the same rules and maxims to his own times, which were fast becoming obsolete a century before.

The poet of the Civil Wars, in speaking of a later period, compares Pompeius to the venerable oak, majestic in its decay, and honoured for its antique associations; Cæsar to the lightning of Jupiter, which spares nothing venerable, nothing holy, neither the monarch of the forest nor the temples of its own divinity; Cato he might have likened to the rocky promontory which marks the ancient limits of an encroaching ocean, still resisting the action which has sapped the hills around it, and barely attached to the continent by a narrow and diminishing isthmus.¹ Yet even the iron disposition of the Roman Stoic was not really unaffected by the change of circumstances since the period he blindly admired. The same temper which made the elder Cato a severe master, a frugal housekeeper, the cultivator of his own acres, the man of maxims and proverbs, converted the younger into a pedantic politician and a scholastic formalist. Private life had become absorbed in the sphere of public occupations; the homely experience of the individual was lost in the recorded wisdom of professional instruction. The character of the Censor had been simple and true to nature; that of his descendant was a system of elaborate though perhaps unconscious affectations.

To the customary training in literature and eloquence of the better men of his class Cato

Character of the nobles as a class.

paid little attention; but he distinguished himself by rare assiduity in mastering the details of business. In serving the office of quaestor he introduced method and regularity into the service of the treasury; he was the most punctual and constant attendant in the curia; and oftentimes, while business was standing still, and his colleagues were dropping slowly in, he might be seen sitting in his place, and studying a volume, which he affected to conceal in the folds of his robe. His frame was robust, and he had strengthened his system by endurance; he could harangue with untiring energy throughout an entire sitting, in the same style of dry and unvarying precision. But as yet he had not come prominently forward in debate; it was amidst the grave events of Cicero's consulship, as we shall presently see, that the boldness of his views and the vigour of his character marked him first for the leader of a party. Such a temper could meet indeed with little sympathy among the ranks of the Roman aristocracy; and excessive would have been his perplexity in regarding the various sections of that class, all so alien from himself, could his shrewd but narrow view of men and things have been troubled for a moment by any subject of speculation. For he had to choose his associates or instruments either among the older men, who were indolent and immovable, insensible to public morality, even to the contempt of external decency, or among the younger, who were violent and ferocious, and whose hot patrician blood was inflamed no less by luxury than pride. The early years of the former class had been mostly past in camps. The urgent dangers of the commonwealth had allowed them little leisure, even at home, to cultivate the refinements of social life. At a later period, crowned with success, and with all the enjoyments of unbounded wealth flung suddenly at their feet, they plunged from mere ignorance into a tasteless imitation of eastern sensuality. The pictures of vice which the writers of the age have left us are principally derived from the manners of the highest nobility; and the coarseness which could be plausibly attributed to a Piso and a Gabinius leaves no doubt of the gross habits prevalent among their class.

¹ Lucan, i. 129. Nec coiere pares: etc.

The introduction of Grecian models of intellectual cultivation, which had so honourably distinguished the age of Lælius and Scipio, produced in fact a very imperfect effect upon the progress of the national mind. For half a century, indeed, the new taste seemed to make a genuine impression upon a people far from deficient in natural sensibility, or incapable of appreciating the excellence of such originals. During that happier period it seemed not idle to expect that Rome might become a rival to her mistress and instructress, even in her own accomplishments. It might be hoped that, as among other nations so in Rome also, the time had arrived when arms should give place to the pursuits of peace, and the fruits of youthful education have room and leisure to ripen in maturer years. But this fair prospect was overcast by the circumstances which supervened. The destiny of the race of conquerors prevailed. Each succeeding generation became more immersed in war than its predecessor; the turbid stream of military habits never ran itself clear; the camp continued to pour its sanguine flood into the silver current of humanity and letters. Even those among the Romans who were most renowned for their love of polite literature were seldom wholly absorbed in their devotion to it. Their philosophers and historians, no less than their orators, were public men, and courted the muses in the intervals of toil and danger. They wrote, as they acted, for effect. Disdaining retirement, they had little concern for the graces of simplicity. The purity even of Cicero's taste may be called in question. There is an ostentatious prodigality even in his use of words, akin to the vastness of his ambition and the sumptuousness of his style of living. Cicero indeed scorned the voluptuous refinements which enervate the mind and vitiate the moral sense. But Lucullus, and the accomplished orator Hortensius, second only to Cicero among his contemporaries in persuasive eloquence, a scholar and a wit no less than an advocate and debater, did more to degrade than to exalt the tastes they affected to patronize. The display which Lucullus made of his libraries and galleries of art, in throwing them open to public admiration, however much in advance of the real wants of the age, and calculated to create envy rather than gratitude, might yet be represented as a more magnanimous use of wealth than the vulgar profusion by which others of his order courted the applause of the multitude.¹ Those, however, who knew him more intimately, discovered how little genuine interest he took in these honourable resources of a dignified leisure. In his later years he withdrew himself almost wholly from the more animated scenes of public life, and walked languidly through his part as a senator and statesman, while he devoted all his real interest to inventing new refinements on the luxury of the table.² His example corrupted and countenanced those about him. One after another the nobles sank into a lethargy almost without a parallel. The writers of a later period have associated the proudest names of the martial republic with the idlest amusements and the most preposterous novelties. A Gabinius, a Cælius, a Crassus, were immortalized by the elegance of their dancing.³ A Lucullus, a Hortensius, a Marcius Philippus, estimated one another, not by their eloquence, their courage, or their virtue, but by the perfection of their fish-ponds, and the singularity

Their ostentation coupled with want of refinement.

¹ In fact it was the Greeks in Rome, and not the natives, who took advantage of this munificence. Plutarch, Lucull. 42.

² Vell. ii. 33. Compare Plutarch, Cat. min. 19., Lucull. 40.; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxviii. 14.

³ Macrob. Saturn. ii. 10. Gabinius and Cælius were not mere triflers. They were both active intriguers, though corrupt and dissipated men. M. Crassus had two sons, the younger of whom was a distinguished officer. The Crassus here mentioned was one of these, I should suppose the elder. But the introduction of dancing among the relaxations of the Roman nobility, was of much earlier date, and provoked the indignant animadversion of Scipio Africanus and the elder Cato. Nevertheless it continued to prevail; Sulla himself danced.

of the breeds they nourished. They seemed to touch the sky with their finger, says their mortified advocate, if they had stocked their preserves with bearded mullets, and taught them to recognise their masters' voices, and come to be fed from their hands.¹

If Cato's austere virtue was roused to indignation by the freaks of these degenerate patriots, the temper, on the other hand, of the younger men of the same party was not less repugnant to his sense of justice and reverence for law and order. If Lucullus and Hortensius were frivolous and short-sighted, they might claim at least the merit of moderate views and humane dispositions. The remembrance of the horrors of the civil wars, no less than the delicacy of sentiment engendered by their Greek education, made them shrink from the sight of blood. But the rising generation had no such reminiscences to stifle their natural ferocity; and the increasing barbarity of the public spectacles, perhaps it may be added, of the recognised usages of warfare, steeled their hearts against

¹ Cicero, ad Att. ii. 1. "Nostri autem principes digito se cœlum putant attingere, si muli barbati in piscinis sunt, qui ad manus accedant, alia autem negligunt." Comp. Varro, de Re. Rust. iii. 17., who gives some curious descriptions of the fish-ponds of Lucullus and Hortensius. The former cut through a mountain to introduce salt water into his preserve, for which seat Pompeius gave him the nickname of Xerxes togatus. (Vell. ii. 34.) Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix. 80. seqq., celebrates the inventions of Hirrius, Philippus, Murcena and others, and mentions anecdotes of their extravagance: "invasit deinde singulorum piscium amor:" the ponds of Hortensius were at Bauli; "in quâ murænam adeo dilexit ut exanimatam flesse creditur." Compare Martial, x. 30.:

"Natat ad magistrum delicata muræna,
Nomenculator mugilem citat notum,
Et adesse jussi prodeunt senes mulli."

It seems that this folly lasted a hundred and fifty years. Hortensius was said to moisten his planes with wine (Macrobius, Saturn. ii. 9.), and was the first Roman who brought peacocks to table. (Pliny, H.N. x. 23.) His affectation in dress and manner is noted by Aulus Gellius (Noct. Att. i. 6.).

the compunctions of their fathers. They had not learned from experience the inevitable requital of blood for blood; and they breathed nothing but vengeance and destruction against every one who ventured to cross their path. They would govern the commonwealth by impeachments and assassinations. They would bring back the days of Sullan ascendancy; and certainly nothing but a permanent military dictatorship could spring out of their anarchical policy. These were that bloody-minded youth, of whom Cicero speaks with such aversion and fear, who hired bands of ruffians to attend them in the forum, nor travelled beyond the gates of the city without an armed retinue.¹ Such demonstrations on the one side begat, of course, rival violence on the other. Quarrels and collisions occurred, which there was no efficient police to control; the elections were repeatedly suspended by riotous interference; the legitimate proceedings of the people were interrupted by the clang of arms; the sacred privileges of the tribunes were violated, and the most august personages of the state driven from their posts by blows and menaces. We shall see that the leaders of every party, Pompeius and Cicero, Cato and Cæsar, all suffered alike and in turn, from the unbridled ferocity of such men as Clodius and Milo, as Nepos and Curio.

It has been said that there was no efficient police in Rome. The safety of the capital was deemed secure in the patriotism and military training of the citizens themselves; and the government, founded professedly on a popular basis, disclaimed the use of force, either

The nobles
retain their command of the national armies.

¹ Cic. ad Att. ii. 7. written in the year 695. "Megabocchus et hæc sanguinaria juventus inimicissima est." The mildest terms he can apply to them, when speaking of the transient favour they on one occasion showed to himself are, "libidinosa et delicata juventus." (Ad Att. i. 19.)

for its own protection or for the coercion of the popular will. The laurelled fasces of the consuls surrounded their office with decent pomp, but could provoke no comparison with the traditional tyranny of the kings. The city had far outgrown the walls of Servius, and the idea of foreign invasion might be scouted as visionary; nevertheless, we cannot suppose that the gates stood always open without a guard, or that the fortresses on the Capitoline and the Janiculan were wholly denuded of their defences. But the same government which trusted itself at home to the self-respect of its constituents, did not fail to exercise a jealous control over the armies quartered in the provinces. The garrison of the city was stationed in Gaul or Macedonia; and the rulers of the republic relied for the maintenance of their authority on the attachment of the officers whom they deputed to foreign command. By straining all their influence to secure the election of their own adherents to the highest magistracies at home, they were enabled to consign the legions in the provinces year by year to captains of their own choice. The army, which had long lost its original constitution, and had become a standing force of veterans, enlisted for a long term of years, had ceased to retain the political predilections which the citizens were wont to bring fresh to the camp from the comitia.¹ It had exchanged its interest in patrician patrons or popular demagogues for pure military devotion to the persons of its leaders; and officered as it now was under the ascendancy of the senate, it gave steady support to the existing government, enabling it to defy any attempt at a counter-revolution. Even the possible success of a coup de main could hardly delude the judgment of intriguers in the city, when they contemplated the overwhelming resources of the senate abroad, and remembered how effective they had been in the hands of Sulla to scatter the battalions of adventurers nearer home.

¹ Marius abolished the qualification of property, which was originally required of every citizen who offered to enlist. A sufficient motive for this grave innovation might be the peril of the state from foreign invasion, coupled with the growing concentration of property in a smaller class. But its direct effect was to degrade the principles of the legionary, and wean him from his devotion to the state. Compare Sallust, Bell. Jug. 86. “Non ex classibus et more majorum, sed uti eujusque lubido erat, milites Marius scripsit, capite censos plerosque. Id factum alii inopia bonorum, alii per ambitionem consulis memabant, quod ab eo genere celebratus auctusque erat, et homini potentiam quærenti eagentissimus quisque opportunissimus, cui neque sua curæ, quippe quæ nulla sunt, et omnia cum pretio honesta videntur.”

Nevertheless the senate was uneasy. The Marians, under every discouragement, yet seemed to grow in strength. The claims of the popular faction constituted the weak point in the body politic, towards which every evil humour tended. Every fortune misspent, every enterprise baulked, every expectation frustrated, supplied fuel for the fire which was raging in its vitals. Secure as the government might feel of its soldiers' fidelity, while retained under their ensigns, to disband and disperse them in colonies, though demanded by themselves, and expedient on various accounts, would at once dissolve the ties which ensured their allegiance. No class was more ready for tumult and revolt than the veterans of Sulla, settled recently in ease and apparent contentment throughout Italy. They only wanted a leader of their own choice to plunge into another civil war, and scramble for fresh booty. The chiefs of the hostile party were moving all the passions of the vast constituency of the city to compass their own election to the curule magistracies. From office in the city to authority in the provinces the step was direct and inevitable. A Marian proconsul might hope to lay the foundations of his meditated supremacy in the allegiance of an army and the devotion of a foreign people. With a more ample or a prolonged command, he might convert the West or the East into an arsenal for the munitions of a new civil war, or a fortress for his own security. With this glittering prize in view the popular candidates lavished bribes and largesses with their own hands, while they stimulated their creatures to the use of threats and violence. They assailed their opponents with every available weapon, showered calumnies upon some, menaced others with impeachments, covertly promoted conspiracies from which they kept themselves personally aloof, and scared the city with rumours of impending catastrophes. The nobles defended themselves with clamorous indignation. They sowed discord in the hostile ranks, gained over some of the tribunes to stay the proceedings of the others, retorted slander for slander, not less virulently and perhaps more successfully, while they wielded the engine of the state religion to discredit their enemies' policy, and thwart their tactics. They relied more particularly on their command of the public tribunals to chastise the daring corruption practised by their opponents. But from bribing the electors it was an easy step to buy the suffrages of the judges, and the Marians soon found that they could succeed in the halls of justice not less readily than in the comitia. When this last bulwark began to be undermined, the nobles felt that the time was at hand for unsheathing the sword in defence of their prerogatives, or submitting to the dictation of terms, the extent of which they could hardly conjecture.

I shall proceed in the next chapter to review briefly the progress of this vital struggle, and to bring out more distinctly the character and aim of the popular faction, in order to complete our introduction to the ensuing history.

CHAPTER III.

The Marian or Popular Party represented by Cæsar.—His Character and Political Views.—His Early Dangers and Good Fortune.—He assumes the Leadership of the Marian Party: Harasses the Senate with repeated Attacks: Becomes Quæstor, Ædile, and Supreme Pontiff.—The Catilinarian Conspiracy.—Triumph and Presumptuousness of the Nobles.—They defy Pompeius, despise Cicero, and adopt Cato as their Leader.—Character of the Period.—Cæsar alone fulfils the Idea of the Hero demanded by the Age.

THE policy and conduct of the popular party at the great crisis of the commonwealth may be best understood by tracing the career of its illustrious leader, who stood forth far more prominently among his own associates, and gave more distinct expression to their aims, than was the case with any one of the chiefs of the opposite faction whose character has already passed under our review. To that grand array of aristocratic gravity, of military renown, of learning and eloquence, of austere and indomitable virtue, were opposed the genius and resources of one man. He bore, indeed, an ancient and honourable name; his talents for war were, perhaps, the highest the world has ever witnessed; his intellectual powers were almost equally distinguished in the closet, the forum, and the field; his virtues, the very opposite to those of Cato, have been not less justly celebrated. But one qualification for success he possessed beyond all his rivals; the perfect simplicity of his own character gave him tact to appreciate the real circumstances and tendencies of public affairs, to which his contemporaries were signally blind. He watched the tide of events for many anxious years, and threw

C. Julius
Cæsar, born
A. u. 654.
B. c. 100.

himself upon it at the moment when its current was most irresistible. Favoured on numerous occasions by the most brilliant good fortune, he never lost the opportunities which were thus placed within his grasp. He neither indulged himself in sloth like Lucullus, nor wavered like Pompeius, nor shifted like Cicero, nor, like Cato, wrapped himself in impracticable pride; but equally capable of commanding men and of courting them, of yielding to events and of moulding them, he maintained his course firmly and fearlessly, without a single false step, till he attained the topmost summit of human power.

Caius Julius Cæsar, the greatest name in history, was descended from a genuine Roman family of the highest antiquity.¹ He seems to have been himself the first to claim descent from the hero Iulus, the offspring of Æneas, and through him from the goddess Venus²; a legendary genealogy which the poets adopted with ardour, and rendered universally familiar.³ The name of Julius Iulus occurs several times in the list of the earlier consuls, but this branch of the house seems to have become extinct; while that from which Caius Cæsar himself sprang could also boast of more than one consulship, and a large share of other public honours.⁴ Besides the father and grandfather of Caius, whose

¹ The Julii were both patrician and plebeian: the branch which bore the surname of Cæsar belonged to the former class. A Julius Proculus played a memorable part in the story of Romulus.

² In the funeral oration which he pronounced over his aunt Julia, who had been the wife of Marius. (Suet. Jul. 6.) At this time he was in full pursuit of the great object of his ambition, and this assertion of his divine descent must be regarded as a stroke of policy, and not as a mere ebullition of youthful vanity.

³ Vell. ii. 41.; Appian, B.C. ii. 68.; Dion, xli. 34.; and the poets passim.

⁴ For the supposed derivations of the cognomen Cæsar, see Festus, in voc. Cæsar; Servius on Virg. Æn. i. 290.; Pliny, H.N. vii. 7.; Spartian. in Æl. Ver. 1.; Isidor. Orig. i. 1., etc.

His parentage, and connexion with Marius, from whom he inherits the leadership of the popular party.

Comprehensiveness of his views.

names are honourably recorded, several of his uncles and cousins are mentioned in the annals of the time. They seem, for the most part, to have taken the side of the aristocracy in the civil wars¹, and more than one of them were slain by Fimbria among the enemies of Marius and Cinna.² But Marius himself was married to a Julia, sister to the father of Caius Cæsar; and the nephew inherited from his uncle the championship of the popular party, his connexion with which he further cemented in early youth by espousing the daughter of Cinna.³ Having thus planted himself in decided opposition to the oligarchy, he was not dazzled by the brilliancy of their position, nor deceived in his estimate of their vaunted strength and resources. He saw how rotten was the foundation on which their power really rested, which was no more than the traditionary awe of the lower ranks, and the precarious influence of interests ill understood. On the other hand, he discerned with rare sagacity the omens of success in the camp of the Marians. He knew that their strength, great as it was even at Rome, under the very shadow of the patrician majesty, was supported moreover by many external bulwarks, such as the ambition of the Italians, the restlessness of the veterans, and even the hatred of the provincials to the ruling class, with whose injustice and tyranny they were most familiar.¹ He foresaw that the genuine Roman race would be overwhelmed by the pressure of its alien subjects; but he conceived the magnificent idea, far beyond the ordinary comprehension of his time, of reducing the whole of this mighty mass, in its utmost confusion, to that obedience to the rule of a single chieftain which it scorned to render to an exhausted nation. He felt, from the first, the proud conviction that his genius could fuse all its elements into a new Universal People; and the more he learned to appreciate his contemporaries, the more was he persuaded that none among them was similarly endowed. The pertinacity with which he assailed the principles and prejudices by which the actual system of society was still loosely held together, bespeaks, in my apprehension, a deliberate policy. With a distinct aim in view, a mind so comprehensive could not overlook the bearings of each separate act; with a firm grasp of his means, a hand so steady could deal no uncertain or unpremeditated blows. At the same time I can trace in this daring attack upon the institutions of his country no barbarous love of destruction nor vulgar pride of power, but a solid and just conviction that they had become obsolete and fatally insecure, and a reliance, not less just, upon his own resources to create new ideas in harmony with his new legislation.

¹ L. Julius Cæsar was consul at the commencement of the Social war, and took the command of the Roman armies. In the heat of the struggle he perceived the wisdom of concession, and succeeded in carrying a law for the admission of the Italians to the franchise of the city. But the character of the war was changed by this time, and many of the Italians refused to avail themselves of the boon. (Cic. pro Balb. 8.) The son and grandson of this Cæsar were noted partisans of the senate at a later period, though they had little influence in public affairs.

² Flor. iii. 21.

³ Cornelia, by whom he had his only daughter Julia. (Suet. Jul. 1.) His friends had betrothed him at a still earlier period to an equestrian heiress named Cossutia, but he had refused to marry her, preferring perhaps an important political connexion.

Cæsar was called upon to assert his courage and his political principles at the very outset of his career. Sulla, suspicious of the youthful nephew of his rival, and urged perhaps to destroy him by some of his own adherents, but restrained by some lurking feeling of mercy or sympathy with a kindred genius, required

He is persecuted by the Sullan party.

¹ “*Romanos odere omnes, dominosque gravantur
Quos novere magis.*” Lucan, vii. 284.

him to divorce his wife Cornelia, and thus loosen his connexion with the Marians.¹ That party was at the moment in its lowest state of despair. The proscription had lopped off all its leaders, and no one dared to raise his head above the ranks of the multitude, who were protected by their insignificance. There was no one among them to whom Cæsar could appeal for protection ; yet, though now only in his eighteenth year, he refused to comply with the dictator's command. Sulla was staggered by his boldness, and still refrained from striking. At the tyrant's decree even Pompeius, the rising favourite of the senate, had abandoned his consort Antistia², while Piso had divorced Annia, the widow of Cinna. But the dictator, it would seem, was growing weary of power. He was satisfied with the revolution he had effected ; he entertained, as he proved by his abdication, a feeling of magnanimous confidence in the stability of his work ; and, in a moment of generosity or wanton defiance, he spared the life of one from whose genius he anticipated a brilliant career. He is said, indeed, to have remarked that in Cæsar there was more than one Marius, and to have warned the magnates of the senate, some of whom had ventured to intercede for him, to *beware of that young trifler.*³ Nor was the young Marian allowed to escape altogether with impunity. He paid for his constancy by the loss

¹ Suet. Jul. 1.; Plut. Cæs. 1.

² The circumstances of this base compliance are touched with some feeling by Plutarch (Pomp. 9.), though in general the victims of such political unions commanded little sympathy from the ancient writers.

The reader may refer to Mr. Robert Eyres Landor's Fountain of Arethusa, if he would see of what flagrant colouring this particular desertion is susceptible. But we must be careful not to contemplate a violation even of abstract morality from too modern a point of view.

³ Suet. l. c.; Plut. l. c.; Macrob. Sat. ii. 3.: “Ut puerum male præcinctum enverent.” Dion, xlivi.43.: Τὸν κακῶς σωννίμενον φυλάττεσθε.

of his place in the priesthood and of his wife's fortune. He was himself compelled to seek an asylum at a distance from Rome, beyond the immediate observation of his enemies; and until his pardon was assured, he lurked in disguise among the Sabine mountains.¹

The friends of Cæsar had represented to the dictator his youth, his careless habits, his insignificance, as reasons why he might be spared with safety. The reply of Sulla showed that he saw further into his character than ordinary observers. He had the acuteness to know how much energy and power of application is frequently concealed in youth under an exterior of thoughtless dissipation. The future orator, historian, and statesman was doubtless actively employed from his earliest years in storing his mind with learning, and laying the foundations of the varied interest in literature which he afterwards developed. He was also deeply meditating the part which he should play in political affairs. The great popular party of the last generation lay exhausted and shattered on the ground. Cæsar determined to revive and consolidate it, and claimed, with the generous devotion of youth, to be the organ of its passions and the centre of its affections. The boldness of his demeanour in collision with the all-formidable dictator stamped him at once as fit to command. He seemed to leap at once into one of the niches of fame and popularity in which the figures of the great men of the day were admired and courted by the multitude. His next step was to make himself conspicuous abroad, to form connexions

Cæsar under-takes the patronage of the popular cause.

¹ He was discovered and seized by one Cornelius Phagita, from whom he escaped by a bribe. It is recorded by Suetonius, as an instance of the clemency of his character, that he never avenged himself upon his captor in the time of his power. (Suet. Jul. 74.; Plut. Cæs. 1.) He was pardoned at the intercession of the Vestal virgins, of Mamercus Aemilius, and Aurelius Cotta. (Suet. Jul. 1.)

for himself and his party among the nations and potentates beyond Italy, who were yearning for a nearer access to the privileges or favour of Rome. At this period the generals of the republic in the East were intently occupied in recovering the authority in the provinces which Mithridates had wrested from her in his first contest. Cæsar learned the first rudiments of warfare at the siege <sup>A. U. 693.
B. C. 81.</sup> of Mytilene, which had revolted from the republic.¹ He profited by the opportunity of a mission to the court of Nicomedes, king of Bithynia, to gain the personal as well as the political friendship of that monarch, who eventually bequeathed his possessions to the Roman people.² He also served under Servilius in Cilicia; but as soon as the news of the dictator's death reached the camp, he abandoned the army and returned to play a more conspicuous part in civil affairs.

Upon the abdication of Sulla no one had dared to assail his disposition of political power, such was the terror which the monster, disarmed and decrepit as he was, still continued to inspire. Upon his death, the young aspirant manifested his self-control in holding aloof from the premature movement of Lepidus.³ Nor did he entangle himself in any way in the projects of Sertorius. Throughout life he never trusted himself to the schemes and combinations of others. Whatever intrigues he may have favoured with the view of thrusting more hasty and

But abstains from joining the movement of Lepidus.
Impeaches
some of the principal nobles.

¹ Suet. Jul. 2.

² The influence which Cæsar obtained over the king of Bithynia, leading, as it apparently did, to this successful result, excited the jealousy of the nobles, and was rewarded by the circulation of infamous but inconclusive charges against his private character. (Suet. Jul. 2.; comp. 49, 50.)

³ Suet Jul. 3: "Et Lepidi quidem societate, quanquam magnis conditionibus invitaretur, abstinuit, quam ingenio ejus diffusus, tum occasione quam minorem opinione offenderat."

violent men into action, he was careful not to compromise his own ulterior plans by proclaiming himself an open enemy of the government, till he had acquired a position from which he might direct and control every instrument he chose to employ. Accordingly, while the sedition of Lepidus was rapidly working the destruction of its movers, Cæsar was methods of moulding circumstances to his designs. He undertook the impeachment of Dolabella, a distinguished noble, for malversation in his province; and, although the senators succeeded, as judges, in screening the delinquent, his accuser was rewarded by the unbounded applause of the people. The provinces hailed him as the patron of the subject against the citizen, and rejoiced in every blow faction. Cæsar repeated the experiment by assailing another distinguished magnate, C. Antonius. In this case the accused, though he escaped at the time, was expelled from the senate by the censors six years afterwards. It was evident that the young trifler's blows already told.¹

^{A. U. 677.} ^{B.C. 77.} betaking himself to slower and more secret

^{A. U. 678.} ^{B. C. 76.} aimed at the prerogatives of the dominant

Still acting upon his principles of caution and delay, Cæsar retired again from Rome, and occupied himself for some time at Rhodes in attendance upon the lessons of the rhetorician Molo.² Even in this proceeding, however trifling, we may discover a trace of

Cæsar studies rhetoric at Rhodes.
Effects of the prevailing taste for foreign study.

¹ Suet. Jul. 4.; Plut. Cæs. 4.; Ascon. in Orat. in tog. cand. p. 84.; Orelli. Cn. Cornelius Dolabella, consul A.U. 673, had been proconsul of Macedonia. C. Antonius, afterwards consul with Cicero (691), was accused of extortion in Greece. These impeachments are coupled with that of Verres for the enormity and notoriety of the offence in each case:

“Inde Dolabella est atque hinc Antonius, inde Sacrilegus Verres.” Juv. viii. 105.

² Suet. L. c.; Plut. Cæs. 3., who is wrong in the order of time. (Comp. Drumann, iii. 135.) Cicero had studied under Molo a few years previously. (Plut. Cic. 4.; Cic. Brut. 91.)

the independence of his character. It had been, from early times, the practice of the Roman magnates to educate their young men for the bar and the forum, by observation of the orators of the day, their own friends and relations. The school was a noble one; its models lived and breathed, and transacted the real business of the state. All their words had a meaning, and might be traced to effective results. But this practice nourished exclusive views of state-policy, and tended to confine the management of affairs in the hands of the favoured class who had private access to the discussions and exercises of the nobility. The sullen patricians of the imperial times looked back with regret to the period when the halls of the Greek rhetoricians had not yet become the resort of political adventurers, and pointed, with bitter triumph, to the sarcasm of Cicero, who had once called them schools of impudence.¹ Yet Cicero himself, the young municipal, to whom, doubtless, the statecraft of the Roman senators was far from freely communicated, had acquired the first rudiments of his own skill and experience in the lecture room, which, when himself ennobled, he thus harshly stigmatized. And Cæsar also may have been compelled to learn the business of the forum, in some degree, from the mouths of the sophists, while he was urged, no less by his own views and inclination, to bring their studies into fashion by his example, and throw wide the portals of political education. Predisposed as he was to imbibe liberal and cosmopolitan ideas, his personal observation of the men of

¹ See the passage in the Dial. de Oratoribus, 35.: "At nunc adolescentuli nostri deducuntur in scenas scholasticorum, qui rhetores vocantur: quos paullo ante Ciceronis tempora extitisse, nec placuisse majoribus nostris, ex eo manifestum est, quod L. Crasso et Domitio censoribus cludere, ut ait Cicero, ludum impudentiae jussi sunt." The passage of Cicero occurs in the De Orat. iii. 24. The words are put into the mouth of L. Crassus, but this speaker is considered generally to represent the sentiments of the writer.

Greece and their modes of thinking may have contributed to enlarge his views, and shake to their foundations the prejudices held sacred by his countrymen. The school of Molo, the resort of the ardent and enlightened youth of all nations, may have prepared the way for his senate of Gauls, Spaniards, and Africans.

The many imminent risks of his life which Cæsar incurred confirmed him in the steadfast confidence with which he relied on his good fortune, which became one of the secrets of his success. During his retirement in the East, he fell into the hands of the Cilician pirates, who were wont to parade their defiance of Rome by murdering the officers of the republic whom they captured. Fortunately the name of Cæsar was not yet enrolled in the annals of the magistracy; but his birth and the wealth of his family were well known, and the ruffians were satisfied with demanding a ransom. The imagination of the narrators has added some romantic embellishments to the story, in accordance with the reckless magnanimity with which Roman tradition loved to invest her favourite hero.¹ He disdained, it was said, to purchase his liberty at so mean a price as twenty talents, and offered his captors fifty. At the same time he threatened them with his vengeance, and pledged himself to return with a fleet, arrest the pirates, and crucify them as common robbers.² His vengeance, indeed, did not slumber. After his release, he collected some forces, attacked and overcame his captors. He was content, however, with offering to send them to Junius Silanus,

He is captured
by the pirates.
His courage and good fortune.

¹ Plut. Cæs. 2.; Polyæn. Stratagem. viii. 23. 1.

² Plutarch gives a graphic account of the way in which Cæsar is supposed to have passed his time among the pirates while waiting for his ransom. He spent eight and thirty days among them, not so much like a prisoner as a prince surrounded by his guards, and he joined in their sports and exercises. He read his verses and speeches to them, and scoffed at their bad taste if they did not applaud them.

the proconsul of Asia, under whose military authority he was acting, that they might suffer condign punishment at his hands. The proconsul, in reply, ordered him to sell them as slaves, but Cæsar resented, as an insult to himself, the lenity or avarice which could dictate such a proceeding. He boldly disregarded the command, and sentenced his prisoners to the cross, the death of slaves and robbers: but the historians thought it worth recording, as an instance of the clemency always attributed to Cæsar in comparison with his contemporaries, that he allowed them to be put to death by a less painful process, before he inflicted upon their bodies the last indignity of the law.¹

Upon his return to the city, Cæsar prepared to enter upon the career of public office, for which his extreme youth had hitherto dis-qualified him. He now began to pay his court to the people with systematic assiduity.² His lofty spirit, his noble aspect and popular manners, even the lustre of his patrician descent, recommended him to their affections; moreover, he had chosen his side as a patron of the popular cause, and had bearded the oligarchy in their stronghold, the courts of justice.³ But it was not sufficient to enlist their prejudices in his favour. The candidate for the suffrages of the people availed himself of the means of bribery and corruption, so generally resorted to, while he surpassed every competitor in the energy with which he practised them. His private means had never been ample; his wife's dowry had been seized by Sulla;

He enters the arena of public honours; is pushed forward by the zealous efforts of his party.
A. U. 680.
B. C. 74.

¹ Suet. Jul. 74.

² The fascination of Cæsar's manners and address is specially noted. Plut. Cæs. 3.

³ The people, says Plutarch (Lucull. 1.), set the young orators upon noble delinquents, just as well-bred whelps are hounded upon wild beasts: Ἐδοκεῖ δὲ καὶ ἄλλως αὐτοῖς ἀνευ προφάσεως οὐκ ἀγεννήτες εἶναι τὸ τῆς κατηγορίας ἔργον.

and he found himself reduced to the greatest straits in supplying the demands of this policy. But he drew boldly upon his own matchless self-confidence. He borrowed of all his friends, and even of his rivals; he pledged his future fortunes; he held out the lure of places and provinces to the wealthier of his own faction; the last reward of their fidelity could be obtained only by placing him, at whatever cost, on the pinnacle of public honours. The pre-eminence of his genius, however, was soon discovered by his own party; as he rose, his adherents must rise with him. Accordingly, he was supported and impelled forwards by the combined efforts of all who had money to stake upon the great game he was playing for their common advancement. In the year 680 he attained his first step in public service, being appointed a military tribune by the suffrages of the people.

Meanwhile the policy which, after crushing the Iberian revolt, Pompeius had deliberately adopted, that of surrendering the most obnoxious privileges conferred by Sulla upon the senate, found, of course, a warm partisan in the self-proclaimed patriot. Thus commenced the intercourse between these destined rivals. They mutually cultivated an appearance of friendship, though with no real cordiality. Pompeius, from the secure elevation of his military ascendancy, might despise the arts of seduction which he had never needed; while Cæsar might look with equal scorn on the lofty pretensions to purity which had never been tested by temptation. Whether from policy, or from the irrepressible openness of his temper, Cæsar on his part affected no concealment of his designs, as far at least as they had yet dawned upon his own mind. His projects of counter-revolution became more frankly avowed every day, and it was only a misplaced contempt for one whom he regarded as a clever profligate, that could

Cæsar defies
the law of Sulla in exhibiting the bust of Marius.

suffer Pompeius to view them with such unconcern. The measure by which the judicia were distributed among the senate, the knights and the ærarian tribunes, proposed by Aurelius Cotta, the uncle of Cæsar, was supported and perhaps suggested by the active zeal of the nephew. Cæsar came forward once more as an orator; he pleaded the cause of his wife's brother, Cornelius Cinna, proscribed for his connexion with Sertorius, and obtained his rehabilitation with that of other Marian exiles. The reputation of his eloquence was established. Cæsar's style of oratory was grave, forcible, and practical. He charmed the acute ears of his countrymen by the accuracy of his language; but though possessed of all the aids of rhetoric and technical learning, his plain native sense was never overlaid by acquired accomplishments.¹ On the death of Julia, the widow of Marius, her nephew pronounced a funeral oration in ^{A. U. 686.} ^{B. C. 68.} her honour.² Of course a much larger share of his panegyric was devoted to the hero Marius than to the respectable matron, the ostensible subject of the ceremony. The brave Arpinate had been a mere son of the soil; but his exploits had raised his name to a level with the most illustrious Romans; and when the orator boasted in the same breath of his own descent from the gods, and connexion with the plebeian champion, the people felt it as a compliment to themselves, and declared that two such eminent titles to their esteem were fitly associated in the same person. Sulla had attempted, in the wantonness of power, to obliterate all remembrance of his rival. No monuments were allowed to rise in his honour. The public exhibition of his bust was forbidden. But this decree Cæsar boldly violated, and paraded an image of Marius among the other insignia of his family.¹ From the effigies of the dead the Romans were wont to derive incentives to every noble sentiment; they crowded the apartments of the living with busts of their deceased ancestors, and on every occasion of funeral pomp these waxen memorials were drawn forth from their receptacles, and the glories of the family displayed to the gaze of the citizens. The effect upon the fervid passions of an Italian populace was often, as in this case, electric; and from that moment, perhaps, the popular party began to regard Cæsar as the representative of their lost chieftain, and the heir to their favour and affections.

¹ Quintil. Inst. Orat. x. 1. "Exornat hæc omnia mira sermonis, cuius proprio studiosus fuit, elegantia." Comp. Cic. Brut. 72, 75.; Gell. i. 10.; Dial. de Orat. 25.; Macrob. Saturn. i. 5.

² Suet. Jul. 6.

Cæsar at this period was serving the office of quæstor in the city, upon the expiration of which he followed the propraetor Antistius to Spain.² He serves the office of quæstor in Spain. In his share in the administration of the province he obtained the praise of industry and vigour.³ The sophists of a later age, who were wont to vaunt him as a striking instance of the conversion of a dissolute youth to the noblest aims and virtues, imagined a sudden change to have taken place in his character at this time, and ascribed it to his reflections on beholding a statue of Alexander the Great at Gades, and to a dream of auspicious interpretation.⁴ But there is really no trace of any such conversion in

¹ Plut. Cæs. 5. On the death of his wife Cornelia, about the same time, Cæsar delivered also a funeral oration over her. It was not the custom to bestow this honour upon young married women, and Cæsar obtained credit by this act for peculiar kindness and affection to the memory of his wife. He probably seized the opportunity to proclaim to the world his connexion with the family of Cinna, in whose behalf he supported the bill of Plautius for allowing the adherents of Sertorius to return to Rome. Suet. Jul. 5.; Gell. xiii. 3.

² Plut. Cæs. 5.

³ Vell. ii. 43.

⁴ Suet. Jul. 7.; Dion, xxxvii. 52.; but they differ as to the time, which Dion puts some years later. Plutarch connects the dream (ἔδοκει τῇ ἐντροῦ μητρὶ μίγνυσθαι τὴν ἄρδητον μίξιν) with the passage of the Rubicon.

Cæsar's history. Through life he acknowledged, it must be confessed, no other restraints than those of policy and opportunity; though as his aims became more distinct and engrossing he might learn to refrain from some indulgences, to which, we may believe, he had never wholly abandoned himself. The extent indeed to which he could make such indulgences compatible with his manifold higher interests, as a statesman and a man of letters, may affect us with pain and wonder: but it forms an essential part of the universal character before us, and in the vices of Julius Cæsar the pride of our common nature is humiliated.

After an interval of two years, the young champion of the Marians gained another step in the career of public honours. His own daring profuseness, perhaps, and the ardour of his numerous friends, secured his election to the ædileship, a post which afforded peculiar opportunities to a candidate for popular favour, and in which he acquitted himself very much to the satisfaction of the people.¹

He becomes ædile, connects himself by marriage with the family of Pompeius,
restores the trophies of Marius, and baffles the indignation of
the nobles.

Following steadily the bold policy which he had adopted upon mature calculation, he bade high for their applause by the magnificence of his shows and entertainments.² He had prevailed upon his colleague Bibulus, a wealthy noble, to furnish the sums requisite for this lavish expenditure, for his own private resources were exhausted, and his debts amounted to thirteen hundred talents. He might share the credit of generosity with his colleague³, but he knew

¹ Cæsar was ædile, A.U. 689, in the consulship of P. Cornelius Sulla and P. Autronius Paetus.

² The gladiatorial shows with which he celebrated the memory of his father were peculiarly splendid. "Omni apparatu arenae argenteo usus est." Plin. H.N. xxxiii. 16.

³ Even this was not the case, for the goodwill of the people insisted upon ascribing the whole merit to their favourite. Bibulus consoled himself by making the best bon-mot the occasion allowed: "Nec that its more substantial recompense would accrue to himself alone. Meanwhile he had exerted all his growing influence to forward the schemes by which the friends of Pompeius fostered their patron's ambition, and widened the breach, already apparent, between him and the senatorial party. ^{A. U. 687.} He had chosen to connect himself, by a second marriage, with a branch of the Pompeian house ; and his pretended devotion to its chief's aggrandisement might be mistaken by its object, and by the world, for respect and duty.¹ The success of the Manilian bill was owing, probably, far more to the crafty support of Cæsar and Crassus than to the eloquence of Cicero. The exhibition of the bust of Marius in a funeral procession had already irritated the nobles ; but now a greater insult was inflicted upon them. Among his other acts of munificence as ædile, Cæsar had decorated the forum, the basilicas, and the Capitol with pictures and statues ; he had enlarged them with additional porticoes for the gratification of the people, and these also he had adorned with monuments of taste and luxury.² One morning there suddenly appeared among the new ornaments of the Capitol the statue of Marius surrounded by the trophies of his Cimbric and Jugurthine victories.³ The people shouted with delight ; the nobles scowled with indignation. The author of the deed did not proclaim himself, but neither friends nor foes could err in assigning it to the daring ædile. Catulus, now replaced at the head of his party, determined to bring the offender to punishment for this breach of the law. His bitterness was aggravated by the remembrance of his father who had been one of dissimulavit collega ejus M. Bibulus evenisse sibi quod Polluci ; ut enim fratribus ædes in foro constituta tantum Castoris vocaretur, ita suam Cæsarisque munificentiam unius Cæsaris dici." Suet. Jul. 10.; Dion, xxxvii. 8.

¹ Pompeia, Cæsar's second wife, was the daughter of Q. Pompeius Rufus, consul with Sulla ^{A. U. 666.}

² Suet. Jul. 10.

³ Suet. Jul. 11.; Plut. Cæs. 6.

the most distinguished victims of the Marian proscription.¹ He accused Cæsar of throwing off the mask from his ulterior designs; of no longer subverting the republic with mines, but of assailing it with the battering-ram.² Cæsar defended himself before the senate, and succeeded in foiling his accuser; but his triumph was not owing to the favour of his audience, but to the temper of the people, upon which the nobles dared not make an experiment. It would appear, from the historians, that the trophies of Marius retained possession of their conspicuous place in front of the Capitol, an indication of the popular strength, which must have shaken the nerves even of Cato himself.³

Both parties had now chosen their ground, and summoned all their resolution. The combat ^{The nobles} ~~retaliate.~~ waxed warmer and warmer. At the first opportunity, the senate hastened to strike another blow. The republic claimed possession of Egypt upon the pretence of a will made in its favour by king Ptolemæus Alexander during the ascendancy of Sulla; but the government had hitherto abstained from enforcing these pretensions.⁴ It preferred to

¹ Cic. de Orat. iii. 3.

² Plut. Cæs. 6.: Οὐκ ἔτι γὰρ ὑπονόμοις, ἔφη, Καῖσαρ, ἀλλ' ἔδη μηχανᾶς αἱρεῖ τὴν πολιτείαν.

³ Suet. Jul. 11.: “Tropæa restituit.” Vell. ii. 43.: “Restituta monumenta.” They make no mention of their having been removed. Propertius (iii. 11. 46.) speaks of them as existing at a later period: “Jura dare et statuas inter et arma Mari.” and Val. Max. vi. 9. 14.: “Cujus bina tropæa in uibe spectantur.” The antiquaries of modern Rome thought they had discovered a portion of these identical trophies in the monument now placed at the top of the steps which lead to the Campidoglio; but the illusion has been dispelled by the greater acuteness of later critics.

⁴ Cicero throws suspicions upon the validity of this claim (De Leg. Agr. ii. 16.); but there is no doubt that the citizens believed in it, and it seems most probable that this was the pretext of Cæsar's demand. The account given by Suetonius (Jul. 11.), that he proposed to restore a king whom the Egyptians had expelled, is evidently a confusion of dates and circumstances. Comp. Drumann, iii. 146.

leave the fertile plains on which Italy relied for no small portion of her daily sustenance in the hands of a dependent sovereign, rather than subject them to the ambition or cupidity of a citizen. But Cæsar now pressed the claim. His immense debts weighed sorely upon him, and he sought the means of cancelling them. He solicited his own appointment to an extraordinary mission, for the purpose of constituting the country a province of the empire, and arranging its administration. Egypt was a golden soil in the imagination of the Romans; and, in the execution of his trust, a political agent might justly hope to amass unbounded treasures. The senate was blind perhaps to this covert object. In its jealousy of Pompeius, and of all who appeared to side with him, it conceived that Cæsar proposed to strengthen its general's hands by adding to his enormous powers the control of one of the granaries of the city. Accordingly, it peremptorily rejected the demand, and proceeded, in addition to this insult, for the demand was plausible, to aim a more direct blow against its antagonist's interests. A tribune of the people named Papius, under the direction of the senate, proposed

^{A. U. 659.} and carried a decree for removing all aliens
^{B. C. 65.} from the city.¹ It was pretended that strangers from the provinces flocked into the city and interfered with the elections, the immense number of the genuine voters rendering it impossible to exercise due caution in taking the suffrages. But this harsh measure was really aimed against the Transpadane Gauls, who were anxious to exchange their Latin franchise for that of Rome. Cæsar, while passing through their country on his return from Spain, had listened affably to their solicitations, and they had gladly connected themselves with him as their patron and political adviser. To injure

¹ Dion. xxxvii. 9.

them was to gall the popular leader, and reduce the estimation in which the provincials already began to hold him.¹

It was now Cæsar's turn to strike. The creatures of Sulla, who, at his instigation had perpetrated the atrocities of the proscription, had obtained an act of indemnity to relieve them from the legal guilt of the murder of Roman citizens. Sulla had caused a general enactment to be passed, defining and assigning punishments for every mode of assassination, but including a special exemption for the instruments of his own recent crimes.² After serving as ædile, Cæsar became entitled to aid the prætors in their tribunals: he had been chosen to preside in the court to which charges of murder were referred. In this capacity he listened to accusations against two of Sulla's ruffians, and pronounced sentence of death upon them.³ The people, no longer startled by the violation of an unpopular law, had expressed their satisfaction at this stroke. The victims themselves were justly odious, and they fell without commiseration. But Cæsar did not stop here. These proceedings were merely intended to prepare the way for another and more terrible demonstration against his opponents.⁴ Thirty-six years before L. Saturninus, a tribune and favourite of the people, had headed a revolt against the government, Cæsar strikes again. Proceedings against Sulla's agents in the proscription. Prosecution of Rabirius.

¹ This was called the Lex Papia de peregrinis or de civitate Romana. Dion, xxxix. 9.; Schol. Bob. in Orat. pro Arch. Cic. de Off. iii. 11.

² This was the Lex Cornelia de sicariis. Suet. Jul. 11.

³ Cato, in his quæstorship, had already prosecuted the agents of Sulla who had received public money in reward for their services to him in the proscription. Plut. Cat. Min. 17.

⁴ The case of Rabirius may be conveniently noticed here, as belonging to the same series of attacks upon the persons of the nobility as those just mentioned. But it did not occur till the early part of Cicero's consulship, A.U. 691.

and seized the Capitol.¹ The consuls, Marius and Valerius, summoned the citizens to their aid. After besieging the public enemy in his fortress, they at last reduced him by cutting the pipes which supplied it with water. The consuls, it appears, offered him pardon on capitulation²; but, upon his opening the gates and descending from his fastness, a tumult arose, his party was attacked, and himself killed in the confusion. A slave named Scæva declared himself the man who had struck the blow, and obtained a public reward for the good service he was supposed to have done. For many years no further notice was taken of the circumstance. But it was determined in Cæsar's councils to make this event, so long passed, a pretext for another attack upon the oligarchy; and an aged senator named Rabirius was selected to suffer the charge, now apparently for the first time advanced, of having been the real author of the deed. The man himself was not unjustly obnoxious for the foulest cupidity and tyranny imputed to his class; but the charge against him was grossly iniquitous, and was preferred, perhaps, on that very account, that its extravagance might evince in the most glaring manner the determination of the popular leaders to drive the senate to extremity. The trial was held before the tribunal at which Cæsar himself presided, together with his kinsman Lucius.³ Cicero defended the criminal;

¹ A.U. 654, the year of Cæsar's birth.

² Cicero's argument that the pardon of the consuls was not valid because it had not been formally ratified by the senate is a mere quibble; but such an act on the part of Marius, who was sometimes a reluctant instrument in its hands, would be regarded with jealousy by that body. Cic. pro Rabir. 10. The whole speech is an appeal to the passions much more than to the judgment and equity of the hearers; but the facts of the case were in themselves overwhelmingly strong in favour of the accused.

³ They were styled duumviri perduellionis, judges of murder. L. Cæsar had been consul the preceding year, and was generally connected with the party of the senate, but he seems on this occasion to but his eloquence was not likely to avail, and sentence was given against his client. The charge was capital, and an appeal lay in one quarter only, the comitia of the tribes. This resource seemed to offer but a slender chance of success, but it was necessary to resort to it; and it might be faintly hoped that the declamation of the unrivalled orator would have greater effect upon an excitable multitude than upon cool and prejudiced judges. But Cicero again failed, and but for the timely interference of a prætor, Metellus Celer, the unfortunate Rabirius could hardly have escaped the confirmation of his sentence. When the frontiers of Rome were but a few miles from her gates, and the advance of the Etruscans behind the barrier of the Vatican and Janiculan hills was frequently sudden and unexpected, watch was kept upon an eminence beyond the Tiber, to give notice of the approach of an enemy, whenever the people were occupied with the transaction of business in the Campus Martius. The signal of danger was the removal of the great white flag which floated conspicuously on the summit of the Janiculum.¹ The people broke up hastily from their elections or debates, and rushed to man the walls. The old custom remained in force for centuries among a people more than usually retentive of antique observances.² Metellus, acting possibly in concert with the managers of the prosecution, struck the flag, and suspended the proceedings. The excited and blood-thirsty populace understood and perhaps have been completely under the influence of his kinsman Caius. Dion, xxxvii. 27. The circumstances of this trial, which we gather from a comparison of Cicero's pleadings with Dion's succinct narrative, have given rise to much controversy. The statement in the text is taken from Dion.

¹ Serv. ad Æn. viii. 1. : "Alii album et roseum vexillum tradunt, et roseum bellorum, album comitiorum signum fuisse."

² Dion, who gives this account (xxxvii. 28.), says that the practice still continued in his own day : Kai éti te kai vuv ðstas éveka πολεῖται.

laughed at the trick, consenting cheerfully to be balked of their prey for the sake of a constitutional fiction. The object of the charge, which was only intended perhaps to alarm and mortify the nobles, being already gained, the prosecutors abstained from pressing the matter, and it was allowed to fall into oblivion.

Indefatigable in harassing the oligarchy, the leaders of the popular party had already undertaken to support the agrarian law proposed in the previous year by one of the tribunes, Servilius Rullus. The author of the bill urged the appointment of commissioners to carry into effect three great popular measures.¹ The first of these was the division among the commonalty of all the public land beyond Italy which had been acquired by the republic since the consulship of Sulla and Pompeius Rufus in the year 666. This domain embraced a large portion of the conquests of Lucullus and Pompeius in the East; for all conquered territories, which were neither assigned to Roman colonies nor restored upon their submission to the natives, accrued to the state itself, and were granted in occupation to favoured citizens on easy terms, but with no right of property. In Italy, also, the event of the social war had thrown the lands of the vanquished into the possession of the republic; and these had either been given to the Sullan veterans as colonists, or let to them as tenants. But this portion of the public domains, although acquired since the period assigned by him, the tribune excepted from his law, and did not venture to touch.² How-

¹ Cic. de Leg. Agr. contra Rull.; Plut. Cic. 12. The discussion of these measures took place at the commencement of Cicero's consulship, 691. His first speech was spoken on the first of January (in Pison. 2.).

² The Social war was terminated in the year of Sulla's and Pompeius's consulship: Rullus had drawn his line immediately previous to that epoch.

The agrarian
law of Rullus, another weapon of the Mallian party.

ever popular such interference might have been, it would doubtless have been dangerous. Cicero declares that it would have involved the kindred of the tribune himself in the common ruin of the men who had benefited by the dictator's liberality. But it would have been, no doubt, a great boon to the clamorous poverty of the urban populace to receive assignments of public territory in the east, whatever its amount may have been, which we have no means of estimating.

In the second place, the commissioners were to inquire into the pecuniary transactions of the generals of the republic, who had returned from their eastern victories laden with the spoils of war and the presents of subjects and allies. It was proposed that the whole of the sums which they had thus personally acquired, beyond what they had expended upon public works, or handed over to the treasury, should be restored to the commissioners appointed to make the investigation. Pompeius himself, such was the gratitude and delicacy of the republic, was to be exempted from this restitution: but the account of others was to be made retrospective; even inherited property, it seems, was to be swept into the net; and it was from Faustus Sulla, the son of the dictator, that the amplest return was anticipated.

A third provision of the law was, that a tax should be imposed upon all public lands excepted from the sale. The moneys thence accruing might be used by the commissioners in making such purchases of land for division as they should judge desirable. But the point upon which Cicero, who resolutely opposed the measure throughout, lays the greatest stress, as the most arbitrary and dangerous of all, was the proposed division among the people of certain domains in Campania, and the drafting of colonies to Capua and neighbouring places. He declares his grave alarm lest Capua should thus become the seat of a great plebeian community in opposition to Rome ; he enlarges upon the dangers which were apprehended from that city in the time of Hannibal ; he expatiates upon the pride and viciousness attributed in all ages to its inhabitants, and denounces the scheme as one which must infallibly create a great rival power in the centre of Italy. During the progress of the social war the allies had threatened to destroy Rome, and plant at Corfinium the capital of an Italian confederacy.¹ Such perils might occur again ; and though Cicero himself may have entertained no serious solicitude regarding the foundation of the new colony, we can understand how plausible his argument was, as addressed to the jealous pride of the Roman comitia. The orator's speeches against the agrarian law of Rullus were amongst the most specious triumphs of his art. In three successive harangues he first convinced the senate of the impolicy of the proposal, then persuaded the people that it would be of no advantage to their interests, and, finally, defended himself against the tribune's insinuation that his opposition had been grounded Critical position of Cicero. on personal views.' As regarded Cicero indeed, and his vigorous hostility to this measure, its introduction placed him in a critical position, from which it required consummate dexterity to extricate him with any appearance of honour. He had just reached the summit of his ambition, first by the advocacy of certain popular claims, under the shelter of Pompeius, and again by persuading the nobles that he had been an aristocrat throughout at heart, that his liberal tendencies had been misunderstood, and that he was, in

¹ Vell. ii. 16. : "Caput imperii sui Corfinium elegerant quod appellarunt Italicum." Comp. Lucan, ii. 136. :

"Tum, cum p̄ēne caput mundi rerumque potestas Mutavit translata locum, Romanaque Samnis Ultra Caudinas speravit vulnera furcas."

fact, entirely devoted to their interests. The bill of Rullus was a test of his real policy which he could not evade. It was one of those decisive measures which try the mettle of the adherents of party; no man could support it and profess himself an oligarch; no man could oppose it and retain the affections of the people. It was an ingenious device of the Marians to compel Cicero to break with the people, whom he had thus far cajoled and, as they deemed, betrayed to the senate. Cicero, indeed, was most reluctant to pronounce openly in favour of the aristocratic party, though it was to their cause that he doubtless proposed from henceforth to devote himself. The effort he made to the last to convince both parties that he was really advocating their interests could deceive neither, and the noisy declamations he vented about the imaginary dangers of his new Carthage were only meant to cover his ignominious retreat from a position which was no longer tenable.

C. Calpurnius Piso was a nobleman of high reputation, and a devoted partisan of the senate. He had been consul in the year of the city 687. He had subsequently obtained the province of Gaul beyond the Alps, and had suppressed the mutinous spirit of the natives with unscrupulous severity. The Allobroges preferred against him a charge of malversation; and his judicial murder of a Transpadane Gaul gave Cæsar, as the patron of that people, an opportunity of coming forward and conducting their prosecution.¹ Cicero was intimately connected with this Piso, whom he had extolled to Atticus as the pacifier of the Allobroges,² and with whom, while absent in Gaul, he had concerted measures for his own elevation to the consulship.³

Cæsar prosecutes Calpurnius Piso : competes with Catulus for the dignity of supreme pontiff, and is victorious.
A. U. 60L.
B. C. 68.

¹ Sallust, B.C. 49.: "Piso oppugnatur in judicio pecuniarum repetundarum, propter cuiusdam Transpadani supplicium injustum."

² Cic. ad Att. i. 13.

³ Cic. ad Att. i. 1.

He now undertook his defence, and the judges found no difficulty in acquitting him.¹ This result was a matter of little concern to the popular party, who were satisfied with seeing the breach between the chiefs of the rival factions daily widened, and their personal animosities rendered irreconcileable. Piso vowed revenge, and soon afterwards made a desperate effort to obtain it, in concert with Catulus, who was at the same time stung by a new disappointment. We have already witnessed the indignation of this veteran champion of the Sullan constitution, when the upstart leader of the Marians exhibited the spoils of their revered hero in the Capitol. He had, moreover, failed in getting this insult punished; the trophies remained to perpetuate its recollection. We may imagine the bitterness with which the idol of the nobles, the honoured prince or leader of the senate, would daily regard them. This feeling was aggravated when, upon offering himself as a candidate for the office of Pontifex Maximus, the most dignified elevation to which a citizen could aspire, he found the same Cæsar, still young in years, still a novice in political affairs, still unknown by civil or military exploits, starting in audacious competition with him.² For the nobles professed to regard Cæsar merely as a reckless spendthrift, and to consider his well-known pecuniary embarrassments his only claim to notoriety. Catulus offered, perhaps in derision, to buy off his opposition by ministering to his necessities, that the field might thus be left open to the rivalry of himself and Servilius, a worthy candidate, who had just returned in triumph from the east with the title of Isauricus. But Cæsar knew his own position, and had calculated his resources. He refused with scorn the offers of Catulus, declared that he would persevere in the contest, and that, as for his debts, he was prepared to borrow more to win it.¹ The enactments of Sulla had withdrawn from the people the appointment to the sacerdotal college, and had constituted that body self-elective. What mode the dictator assigned for the appointment of the supreme pontiff does not clearly appear, but it was probably confided to the comitia of the centuries by the same law of Labienus which had restored the election of the priests generally to the people. It was apparently only a few months or weeks since this great triumph had been achieved by the popular party,² and Cæsar might reasonably count upon the good offices of the electors. Nor did he conceal from himself that he staked all his fortunes upon the die. When the moment arrived, and he was about to present himself in public, his mother attended him in tears to the door of his house, and he embraced her with the words, "This day you will behold your son either supreme pontiff or an exile."³ The election terminated in his elevation to the much coveted honour. The old traditions of the state were violated in favour of one thus young and inexperienced; and the senate was taught that its civil influence was gone for ever: it must now gird itself for the battle, and place its trust in its purse and its sword.

¹ Cic. pro Flacco, 39.: "Consul ego nuper defendi C. Pisonem, qui quia consul fortis constansque fuerat, incolumis est reipublicæ conservatus."

² Sallust, B.C. 49.: "Catulus ex petitione pontificatus odio incensus, quod extrema ætate, maximis honoribus usus, ab adolescentulo Cæsare victus discesserat."

In the midst of this agitation and bewilderment, the assembly of the nobles was suddenly scared by the revelation of a plot for the destruction of the commonwealth. Sulla and Marius, even Cinna too and Lepidus,

The nobles seek to implicate Cæsar and Crassus in a charge of conspiracy.

¹ Plut. Cæs. 7.: 'Ο δὲ καὶ πλείω προσδανεισάμενος ἔφη διαγωνιεῖσθαι.

² Dion, xxxvii. 37.; comp. Fischer, Röm. Zeittafeln, p. 228.

³ Suet. Jul. 13.

had been all party leaders, and their banners had been inscribed with appeals to laws and principles. Pompeius might be intriguing for his own aggrandizement, but at least he put forth some popular pretensions: Cæsar might have vowed the overthrow of the oligarchy, but he too was the champion of a class, and of specific interests. But the man, of whose atrocious enterprise the whole city was about to ring, was the chief of a mere private cabal. The laws were threatened, it was said, with extinction, the city with conflagration, the empire with anarchy or dissolution, to gratify a sanguinary and rapacious crew of selfish adventurers. L. Sergius Catilina, a noble profligate, had sued for the consulship of the year 690. Publius Clodius, a stripling, not less profligate, but as yet less notorious, crossed his path with a charge of malversation in the province from which he had recently returned.¹ A rumour obtained general credit, though, as the case never came before the public, its authenticity must remain uncertain, that upon this repulse, Catilina concerted with Autronius, who had been deprived of the consulship for bribery, with Calpurnius Piso, and other dissolute nobles, a plot to murder the successful candidates, and seize the powers of the state. The names both of Crassus and Cæsar had been whispered in connexion with this threatened revolution. When it was asked upon what military resources the rash intriguers relied, it was answered that Piso, who had acquired the command of one of the Iberian provinces, was charged to organize an armed force in that quarter, with which to balance the legions of the senate under Pompeius. The scheme, it was alleged, was opportunely detected; the chief conspirators were discovered and marked. Piso shortly afterwards was cut off in his province by banditti, or possibly by assassins¹: but the proceedings with which the culprits were menaced by the government were stayed by the intervention of a tribune, and the circumstances of the plot were never formally revealed.

¹ Ascon. ad Cic. Orat. in Tog. cand. p. 85. Comp. Sallust, Bell. Cat. 18.; Cicero, Pro Cælio. 4.

So great however was the influence of Catilina, from his ancient blood and extensive connexions, or such the interest which his presumed machinations could excite among the lawless and ambitious even in the heart of the commonwealth, that not only was the executive power unable to convict him upon this flagrant charge, but he did not shrink from soliciting the consulate itself for the following year, and that too while yet unabsolved from the accusations of Clodius. The character of the arch conspirator is painted for us in the gloomiest colours. Cruel and voluptuous, bankrupt in means and reputation, he supported his extravagance by pandering to the vices of headstrong and prodigal youth. His courage had been conspicuous in his early years in the wars of Marius and Sulla, and in manhood his audacity was fearless as it was unscrupulous. Nor was the cunning, we are assured, less remarkable, with which he cajoled many of the best and wisest citizens. These qualities had placed him at the head of a cabal comprising personages of mark and dignity. His last chance of disentangling himself from his embarrassments was through the consulship, and its reversionary province. His friends, creditors, and dependants, combined to thrust him into this coveted position. His means were formidable; and bankrupt as he was, he could engage the aid of Cicero himself, who was prepared for the sake of his alliance, in their common competition for the consulship, to defend his cause against Clodius.² But the ser-

L. Sergius
Catilina.

¹ Sallust, Bell. Catil. 19. “Nos eam rem in medio relinquemus.”

² Cic. ad Att. i. 2.

vices of the pliant orator were apparently not required. Catilina escaped condemnation through the favour of his judges, and possibly the corruption of his accuser; while on the other hand he failed in his suit for the consulship, which fell to Cicero himself in conjunction with a third candidate, Caius Antonius. Cicero's mouth was unsealed, and a few months later he could stand forth without a blush, and denounce his contemplated client as the foulest monster, the most universal culprit of the age.

The government of the republic was administered ^{The profigacy} by Cicero during the year 691. Some of _{of his aims.} the contests which that year witnessed have already been reviewed. The consul proposed on his own part various salutary enactments; but he devoted himself assiduously to the interests of the oligarchy which, in its fears perhaps and anxieties for itself, had substantially befriended his advancement. Meanwhile, Catilina's position was becoming desperate. The disappointment of his hopes of a province dashed to the ground the last legitimate resource of impoverished ambition. It only remained to bury his private embarrassments in a public convulsion. All ages have their cant term for the cherished anticipation of an era of legalized insolvency. The young Roman prodigals invoked new tables, or a clear balance sheet; and it cannot be doubted that their aims were rather personal than political, that they yearned for the extinction of their debts first, and the division of public offices afterwards.¹

The names of Catilina's associates show how noble _{His associates and partizans.} were the families, how exalted the stations, of the men who now prepared to plunge

¹ Sallust, B. C. 21.: "Tum Catilini polliceri tabulas novas, proscriptiones locupletium, magistratus, sacerdotia, rapinas."

into a desperate revolution. Among them were two nephews of the dictator. Autronius and Cassius had been candidates for the consulship; Bestia was a tribune elect; Lentulus and Cethegus, both members of the Cornelian house, of which Sulla had been chief and patron, were nobles of high distinction, though lost in character: even the consul Antonius was suspected of privity to their designs, and a secret inclination in their favour. They counted upon the support of the men who had been disgraced or impoverished by Sulla¹, and hoped to inflame the turbulence and lust of rapine which animated the dregs of the populace. They expected moreover the armed assistance of numbers of the disbanded veterans, who had already squandered, with the recklessness of fortunate adventurers, the possessions they had so suddenly acquired.² They proposed to solicit and excite the hostile feelings towards their conquerors still prevalent among the Italian races.³ Finally they resolved to seize the gladiators' schools at Capua; and some of them would not have scrupled to arm a new insurrection of slaves and criminals.⁴ This last measure, indeed, was the only enormity to which Catilina hesitated to assent. He was urged to it more especially by Lentulus; and when a proposal so base was discovered in the handwriting of one of the Cornelii, it crowned the horror and indignation of the Roman people.⁵

¹ Cic. pro Muræn. 24 : "Quam turbam dissimillimo ex genere distinguebant homines perculsi Sullani temporis calamitate."

² Cic. in Catil. ii. 9. ; Sallust, B.C. 16, 28.

³ Sallust, B.C. 28.

⁴ Sallust, B.C. 30.

⁵ Such was the tenor of Lentulus's letter discovered upon the person of an accomplice: "Auxilium petas ab omnibus, etiam ab infimis;" which was interpreted by a verbal message: "Quam hostis ab senatu judicatus sit quo consilio servitia repudiet." Sall. B.C. 44.

Catilina continued to veil his purpose by renewed applications for the suffrages of the tribes, but his designs were generally suspected.

^{Discovery and suppression of the conspiracy.} The secret, if such it could be called, was revealed to Cicero by the paramour of one of his accomplices, and by him officially communicated to the senate. The consuls were at once invested with summary powers for the protection of the commonwealth.¹ But in the suppression of so formidable a conspiracy, every step was hazardous. The lives of the noblest Romans were involved in it; the spirit of the populace was questionable or adverse, and their leaders ever on the watch to profit by a false move. The affair required to be placed in such a light as to carry the passions of the citizens along with the government. Cicero manifested consummate adroitness in the course he now adopted. He first drove the arch-traitor to despair by proving his thorough acquaintance with the plot, and then allowed him quietly to make his escape from the city, and even take refuge among his armed adherents. As soon as he was gone and his open defection known, the consul could convene the senate and cause him to be declared a public enemy. He could then represent him as an invading foe, ready to fall upon the city with the men of Etruria and Picenum; he could revive the old panic of a Gallic outbreak, aggravated with the terrors of a servile war. No cry was more sure to rouse the passions of the Roman people, and combine every faction against a common enemy. From that moment also he could convict of treason any citizen discovered merely in correspondence with the proscribed outlaw. The consul resorted to further artifices to get proofs of this nature into his hands.

¹ Sallust, B.C. 29. : "Senatus decrevit darent operam Consules ne quid respublica detrimenti caperet."

He succeeded in securing, with letters on their persons, certain agents employed by the conspirators in the city. Having made himself master of these documents, he caused the culprits to be suddenly arrested. They were produced successively before the senate, and confronted with their own messengers, and the evidence of their own hands and seals. The senate in secret session investigated the charges, and pondered the disclosures of their accomplices. From these private sources it might learn the particular business assigned to each of the associates; which of them should assassinate the consul, which seize the public treasure, which set fire to the city; together with the signals concerted between them, and the contemplated division of the spoil. But in the speech which Cicero addressed to the people, upon the close of the examination, and the conviction of the prisoners, he submitted to them no judicial proof of the existence of such designs. He contented himself with declaring the evidence upon which they had been convicted to be their correspondence with Catilina, a public enemy, and their intercourse with certain envoys of the Allobroges, a Gaulish clan, objects at that moment of popular apprehension.¹ This sufficed to brand them as pledged to succour an invader, to harbour him within the city, and to deliver Rome to the violence of Etrurians and Gauls. This was enough to justify all the frightful vaticinations of fire and slaughter with which Cicero had kept the ears of the people tingling. But to prove their ulterior designs would have involved the disclosure of the degrading means to which the consul had been compelled to resort, his intercourse with the basest of men and women ; it would have been unbecoming the dignity of the government, and, above all, inconsistent with the politic reserve of an aristocratic assembly. Nor perhaps could it have added to the force of Cicero's arguments to have exhibited proofs of designs against himself, for he was not then a favourite with the populace ; nor of the conspirators' intention to share the magistracies and priesthoods, to which it might be wholly indifferent.¹ The object of the government was fully obtained by the partial disclosures it thought proper to make ; and the presumption some modern writers have entertained, that the legal guilt of the criminals was not formally established, is altogether nugatory.

¹ Cicero, in Catilin. iii. 9. : "Homines Galli in civitate male pacata, quæ una gens restat quæ populo Romano bellum facere et posse et non nolle videatur."

The nobles fail to implicate Caesar and Crassus in the conspiracy. The conspiracy thus critically arrested has been represented, in accordance with the evidence before us, as the work of mere private ¹cupidity or ambition. But it was not the policy of the ruling party to allow such an opportunity to escape of incriminating their public adversaries. The insinuation that a Crassus and a Cæsar had combined with the common enemy, was so obvious and natural, that neither then nor since has the rumour been easily discredited. The statement that these chieftains were so deeply concerned in the earlier plot, as to have actually designated themselves the one as dictator, the other as his master of the horse, may be dismissed as a glaring exaggeration. It is, however, far from impossible that they may have secretly favoured the scheme, with the hope of profiting by the explosion. For, whether it succeeded or failed,—and Cæsar we may be sure fore-saw its certain failure,—it must at least add to the embarrassments of the oligarchy; it must tend to precipitate the republic along the path which sloped towards revolution, and render the popular mind familiar with the fatal conviction that the old system of administration could not be worked much longer. But the nobles sought to implicate Cæsar still deeper. Catulus and C. Piso had urged Cicero to include the leaders of the Marians in the impeachments of the presumed delinquents¹: the plot was ripe, witnesses were forthcoming, the blow was ready to fall; nothing perhaps, but the firmness of Cicero, who saw that Cæsar's popularity would in fact screen from justice every culprit with whom he was associated, saved him from standing before the bar of the senate on a charge of life and death.

¹ The reserve which Cicero maintained was not unnoticed by his contemporaries ; but if it was afterwards made a subject of attack by Clodius, it met with the full approbation of graver and better citizens. Cie. ad Att. i. 14. : "Me tantum comperisse omnia criminabatur." Comp. Ad Div. vi. 1. This was the phrase by which the consul was wont to indicate his knowledge of facts when he refrained from revealing his sources of information.

Cicero's eloquence and ingenuity had conciliated thus far the favour of the people, and nerved the arm of the oligarchs with a strength to which they had long been strangers. The question now arose how much farther this favour might be relied on. Nine of the traitors had been convicted; of these five were in confinement; the nature of their punishment remained for decision. The law of the republic, as interpreted at least by the patricians, invested the chief magistrate with power of life and death as soon as the senate should issue its ultimate decree,—Let the consuls see that the state suffer no harm. Nor were there wanting precedents to support in the present case an act of extreme rigour, which the majority of the assembly might be found to justify and applaud. But Cicero was aware that the commons had never consented to such a stretch of prerogative; while associates are condemned to death by a decree of the senate.

Catilina's

¹ Sallust, B.C. 49.: “Sed iisdem temporibus Q. Catulus et C. Piso neque precibus neque gratia Ciceronem impellere potuerunt, uti per Allobroges aut per alium indicem C. Cæsar falso nominaretur.”

their power, as well as their jealousy of the nobles, had much increased since its last exercise in the time of the Gracchi. There existed also a conflicting principle in the Roman law, according to which no citizen could be put to death except by a vote of the tribes. But the senate still hesitated to appeal to the people, by which course they would risk the failure of justice and vengeance altogether. Nor by delegating their own authority to the consul would they secure his impunity, should he venture to act upon it. The passions of the populace, stimulated by angry demagogues, would scorn submission to any such questionable pretensions. Accordingly, even in the moment of triumph, Cicero was too wary to assume at once the proffered responsibility. He appealed once more to the senate itself. He restored to the assembly the sword it had thrust into his hand. The fathers met in the Temple of Concord, the ground-plan of which may yet be traced beneath the brow of the Capitoline ; and from the memorials still preserved to us, we may picture to ourselves a vivid representation of the debate which ensued.¹ The speakers on the side of the government were urgent for capital punishment, which was resisted not less vehemently by their opponents. The popular faction could not be expected to acquiesce in the assumption by the senate of the power of life and death. Banishment or imprisonment was, they contended, the extreme penalty allowed by the law. But their motives were questioned, their loyalty was impeached ; and Cato, on behalf of the oligarchs, could maintain, not without a show of justice, that the convicted criminals were no longer citizens, but enemies of the state. By their connexion with the foreign foe, they had forfeited every Roman privilege. But it was not upon the letter of the law that either party did, in fact, lay the greatest stress. Policy or expediency dictated the most cogent arguments on either side. Finally, the harsher counsel prevailed, and the consul's hands were strengthened by a deliberate decree in favour of the bold stroke to which he personally inclined.

¹ Sallust, B C. 51. seqq. Compare Cicero's fourth Catilinarian oration. How near the language which Sallust ascribes to his speakers approaches the words they really uttered it is impossible to conjecture ; but Plutarch mentions that the speech of Cato alone was preserved, having been taken down in short-hand at the time by Cicero's direction. Plut. Cat. min. 23.

The historian of Catilina's conspiracy assures us that the charge with which Cæsar was threatened was false; at least, that the evidence by which it would have been supported was forsworn; nevertheless, it is from the language which the historian himself ascribes to Cæsar that a shade of suspicion still attaches to him. He sought to save the culprit's lives; but his motive was a public and not a personal one. He contended for the manifest interests of his party; for the advancement of his policy, for the embarrassment of the senate, for the renown of clemency and public spirit. Had he been conscious of complicity in the crime, his first aim must have been to bury the evidence in the graves of his associates. It is fair also to conclude, from his general character, that he shrank from the atrocity of shedding Roman blood on the scaffold, where it had rarely flowed except at the mandate of tyrants. He avowed that the culprits were justly liable to the severest penalty; but to free and high-minded men, banishment, he contended, or imprisonment, would be even worse than death. These punishments the law allowed; the infringement of this law had embittered the rivalry of political factions. The murders of the Gracchi and Saturninus had roused the people to direful vengeance. The proscriptions of Marius had already provoked retaliation. The execution of Lentulus and his associates would reopen the sluices of blood-shed; one reaction would follow upon another; each

Motives and arguments for and against this decree.

party would alternately decimate the other.¹ This was the popular argument of the day. The commonalty was depressed, and they naturally made their appeal to the principles of mercy. But the nobles were elated by the advantage which a plot arrested always gives to a feeble government. They hailed with unrepressed satisfaction an event which enabled them to prove that they could defend their own position without the aid of a military chief.

The patron they suspected and feared had withdrawn from their presence, with the apparent design of collecting his forces at a distance to assail their prerogatives. He had left them exposed to the furious attacks of the Marians, whose courage had evidently revived in his absence. They numbered in their ranks not a few daring spirits, who proposed to seize the crisis and secure themselves at one blow against both the open and the secret enemy. Such men may have been making a tool of Cicero, even while they most loudly applauded the lurid pictures of slaughter and conflagration with which he scared the timid into approval of their measures. The destruction of the traitor chiefs was deliberately planned and executed. When the apparent danger was at its height, the resolution of the waverers was fixed by an act of violence which cut off from them all retreat. Pompeius, it might be expected, would make it a pretext on his return for military interference. The survivors would appeal to him, and he would answer the appeal. The nobles threw down the gauntlet, and defied the commander of their own legions. Assuredly they miscalculated their strength, if they thought to withstand him for a moment; but perhaps they had formed their estimate of their opponent, and trusted by an imposing attitude to awe him into acquiescence. Failing in this, they were prepared to sacrifice Cicero, whom they disliked and despised; while he, not wholly unconscious of their meditated treachery, insisted upon implicating them together with himself in the full responsibility of the execution. Death accordingly was decreed by a large majority of the assembly; and the culprits, five in number, were forthwith strangled in the public prison, or in the houses where they were kept in custody.

¹ Cæsar's arguments, though unsuccessful, had considerable influence. "Metum injecit asperiora suadentibus identem ostentans quanta eos in posterum a plebe Romana maneret invidia." Suet. Jul. 14. Tiberius Nero had preceded him in declaring similar sentiments. Appian, B. C. ii. 5.; Sallust, B. C. 50. How deep the violence of Sulla had sunk into the minds of the Romans may be estimated from a remarkable passage of Dion. Hal. (Ant. Rom. v. 77.) His dictatorship was regarded as a mere tyranny. He acted as no Roman had ever acted before, and treated Romans as Romans had never before been treated.

This first taste of blood sufficed to stimulate the appetite of the triumphant faction; and Cæsar himself, as he descended the steps of the temple, was assailed and well-nigh sacrificed to their barbarous passions. The consul was attended by a number of young men equipped for the defence of his person, and these had crowded round the rival leader, and menaced him with their drawn swords, while they looked anxiously to Cicero himself for a signal to hew him in pieces.¹ But the consul checked their fury, while a spirited youth named Curio, who lived to play a conspicuous part in the troubles which succeeded, threw his cloak round their intended victim, and hurried him away in safety. Such was the current story of the time; but Cicero himself, in writing the memoirs of his consulship, made we are assured no allusion to it. The nobles, who at least regarded it as true, upbraided him for his untimely scruples, and perhaps he did not care to place on record an

Violence of the nobles and discontent of the people.

¹ Plutarch, Cæs. 8.

avowal of the opportunity he had missed. The people who believed the report, and were agitated at their hero's danger, thronged the doors of the assembly at its next sitting, when Cæsar defended himself against the charges made against him in a lengthened and noisy discussion. Believing that he was detained by force, they insisted with shouts and menacing gestures that he should be restored to them. Pacified for a moment, they resorted again and again to tumultuary proceedings. The neediest and most dissolute of the populace excited and fed their agitation, and at last Cato himself was induced to appease their discontent by a monthly allowance of corn from the government.

Cato had been the most urgent of all the speakers in the recent debate for the capital punishment of the conspirators. At the persuasion of the same rash counsellor, the senate ventured to break that union with the equestrian order which had been the aim of Cicero's policy, and his partial success in which had constituted, up to this moment, his greatest triumph. Hardly had the second order obtained a footing in the tribunals, than their rivals sought to avenge the injury by retorting charges of malversation upon them. Presently, certain of the knights who had contracted with the censors to farm the revenues of the eastern provinces, finding that, in their cupidity, they had overreached themselves, besought the government to relax its terms. The senate would listen to no accommodation. Cato, partly from the natural severity and strictness of his temper, partly from his class prejudices, opposed them with sternness, and prevailed upon the assembly to reject their appeal, after degrading them by long suspense.¹ The deepest jealousy and hostility revived between the parties; and

Cato mortifies
and irritates
the knights.

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 18.

this dissension, as it frustrated the aims of Cicero and Pompeius, gave a colour to the events which followed.¹

Thus thwarted in his conciliatory policy, Cicero began henceforth to incline more to the senatorial than the equestrian order. Cicero inclines to the senate. He had tasted the sweets of admission into the highest ranks of an exclusive oligarchy, and his self-love forbade him to renounce its charms and descend to the level where alone he could maintain his dignity and independence. He complained that the knights had deserted the senate, though his vanity would not allow him to admit that they had cooled in their devotion to himself.² They had crowded around him to defend his person against the criminal attempts of the conspirators ; and he persisted in regarding their zeal as a display, not of public interest, but of personal attachment.³ But he soon learned that the services he had performed could secure him no effective control over a party which despised its benefactor, and was resolved to depreciate his merits. No man knew more thoroughly the inefficiency of its vaunted leaders ; their injustice, their violence, and their sloth he had gauged in every arena of public life. He shuddered at the perils gathering around their path ; at the audacity of Cæsar, the offended pride of Pompeius, nor less perhaps at the morose austerity of Cato, under whose guidance they were content to place themselves. Cicero does ample justice to the motives of this new champion, who strove, with firmness and success, to carry out in public life the strictest theories of his stern philosophy. But with the best intentions and the truest loyalty he damaged his own cause: he spoke as one who dwelt in the commonwealth of Plato, and not amidst the dregs of Romulus.¹

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 19.

² Cic. ad Att. i. 19.: "Vidi nostros publicanos facile a senatu disjungi, quanquam a me ipso non divellerentur."

³ Cic. ad Att. ii. 1.: "Nunc vero quum equitatus ille noster, quem ego in clivo Capitolino collocaram, senatum, deseruerit . . . equites curiae bellum non mihi."

The ranks of both parties in the state were filled with men of practical ability, whose lives had been passed in the free and active spheres of the camp and the forum; but, with the exception of Cæsar himself, it would be difficult to point out one statesman among them of original genius, or one who could discern the signs of the times, and conceive comprehensive measures in harmony with them. The temper of the Roman people at this crisis of their history required the guidance of a mind of more vigorous grasp than was possessed by a Cicero or a Pompeius, whose talents as public men were limited to a capacity for administration, but who could neither understand nor grapple with the great evil of the Sullan revolution, which had checked the natural progress of reform and enfranchisement, and restored the landmarks of a constitution which was no longer the legitimate exponent of the national character. The people had already undergone a marked change in their ideas and motives of action, while they were still clinging, with their accustomed pertinacity, to forms from which the living spirit had fled. The extent and rapid succession of their conquests, bringing with them an overwhelming accession of public and private wealth, had filled men's minds with the wildest anticipations. The extravagance of each succeeding year eclipsed the profuseness of its predecessor. M. Lepidus, the consul in the year of Sulla's death, erected the most magnificent dwelling that had been seen up to his day in Rome; within thirty-five years it was outshone by not fewer than an hundred mansions.¹ The same was the case with the extension of the territorial possessions of the nobility, their accumulation of plate, jewels, and every other article of luxury, and no less the multiplication of their slaves and dependants. The immoderate interest which ready money commanded shows that the opening of new channels to enterprise outstripped even the rapid multiplication of wealth. The national prejudice against trade still drove the capitalist from the secure and regular pursuits of commerce to gamble in perilous speculations. The curse of barrenness clung indeed to this ill-gotten abundance: instead of spreading over the face of the empire, the treasures of the world were accumulated in a few rapacious hands. Cicero has recorded the assertion of the tribune Philippus, at no distant period, that not two thousand citizens were possessed of property²: such, it seems, were the real numbers of the class who ruled the East and the West by their armies, their magistracies, their largesses, and their loans. But in the race of cupidity such considerations were little heeded. All eyes were turned from the simplicity of the past and fixed upon a future of boundless promise. Men laughed at the narrow notions of their parents and even of their own earlier years. It is only once or twice in the course of ages, as on the discovery of a new continent, or the overthrow of a vast spiritual dominion, that the human imagination springs, as it were, to the full proportion of its gigantic stature. But even a generation which has witnessed, like our own, an extraordinary development of industrial resources and mechanical appliances, and has remarked within its own sphere of progress how such circumstances give the rein to the imagination, what contempt for the past, what complacent admiration of the present, and what daring anticipations they engender regarding the future, may enter into the feelings of the Romans at this period of social agitation, and realize the ideas of an age of popular delirium.

Extravagant ideas popularly afloat. Want of an original and powerful mind to guide them.

¹ Cic. L. c.: "Sed tamen ille optimo animo utens, et summa fide, nocet interdum reipublicæ. Dicit enim tanquam in Platonis πολιτείᾳ non tanquam in Romuli fæce sententiam."

¹ Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 24.

² Cic. de Off. ii. 21. "qui rem haberent."

Caesar the only man who could fulfil the demands of the crisis.

When the mind of a nation is thus excited and intoxicated by its fervid aspirations, it seeks relief from its own want of definite aims in hailing the appearance of a leader of clearer views and more decisive action. It wants a hero to applaud and to follow, and is ready to seize upon the first that presents himself as an object for its admiration, and to carry him forward on his career in triumph. Marius, Sulla and Pompeius, each in his turn, claimed this eager homage of the multitude; but the two former had passed away with his generation, and the last lived to disappoint the hopes of his admirers, for whom he was not capable of extending the circuit of the political horizon. For a moment the multitude was dazzled by the eloquence and activity of Cicero, but neither had he the intellectual gifts which are fitted to lead a people onward. The Romans hailed him as the saviour and father of his country, as another Romulus or Camillus¹; but this was in a fit of transient enthusiasm for the past, when their minds were recurring for a moment to their early founders and preservers. It was still to the future that their eyes were constantly directed; and it was not till the genius of Cæsar burst upon them, with all the rapidity and decision of its movements, that they could recognize in any of the aspirants to power the true captain and lawgiver and prophet of the age.

¹ Cic. in Pis. 3.; Plut. Cic. 22.; Appian, B.C. ii. 7.; Plin. H. N. vii. 30.; Juvenal, viii. 244.

CHAPTER IV.

Defeat and Death of Catilina.—The Oligarchy derives great confidence from this success, and defies Pompeius.—Popularity of Cicero.—Cæsar's progress in the attainment of Honours and Power.—Return of Pompeius from Asia: He resents the attitude of the Senate towards him.—The Senate turns the licentiousness of Clodius to a political object.—Pompeius allies himself with Cæsar and Crassus.—The Triumvirate.—Cæsar's Consulship, and continued hostilities between him and the Senate.—He obtains the Province of Gaul.—Clodius elected Tribune: His popularity, and machinations against Cicero.—Abandonment of Cicero by the Consuls, and coldness of the Triumvirs.—He is assailed by Clodius, and retires into Exile.

CATILINA had replied to the denunciations of Cicero with a few words of furious menace: but, on leaving Rome, he addressed letters to some of the principal men of the city, in which he declared his intention of betaking himself to Massilia as a place of voluntary exile.¹ But to Catulus, who either was, or whom at least he wished to be considered, a more intimate friend, he opened himself without disguise. He declared that he was urged to extremity by the violence of personal enemies; that he could no longer endure to see the elevation of unworthy Romans to places of trust and honour, from which he was himself excluded by unjust suspicions; that, in short, he was now resolved to effect a revolution in the state, for such was the obvious meaning of his threat to undertake the defence of the poor and the oppressed in Italy and the city.² On reaching Arretium in Etruria he assumed the ensigns of military command,

Catilina puts himself at the head of the insurgents in Etruria.
A. U. 691.
B. C. 63.

¹ Sall. B. C. 33, 34.

² Sall. B. C. 35.

and repaired to the camp of his adherent Mallius, who had already gone forward to raise the standard of revolt, and was actively appealing to the hopes and necessities of the rustic population. The senate forthwith issued a decree by which Catilina and his lieutenant were declared enemies of the state, and ordered the consul Antonius to levy troops for their destruction. At the same time it deemed it prudent to offer pardon to all, except the two leaders, who should abandon the guilty enterprise; but not a single man, it is said, was found to desert his chiefs. On the other hand, while some supplies of men and money were forwarded from his coadjutors in Rome, Catilina received considerable addition to his forces from among that desperate class which rejoiced in the prospect of an impending revolution, and now rushed to share the peril and the spoil without any previous concert with the conspirators.¹

The rebel force now consisted of two legions of the ^{His defeat and death.} ordinary complement, but not above one fourth of the number were fully equipped, the rest having armed themselves with any weapons which they could seize or fashion for the occasion. While awaiting the result of his friends' machinations in Rome, Catilina kept to the mountains, out of the reach of the consul's forces. Antonius himself showed great tardiness and indecision; his conduct was open to the suspicion of sympathy, if not of concert, with the enemy he was sent to subdue. But, fortunately for the republic, his lieutenants were men of vigour and activity. The prætor, Metellus Celer, had checked by the rapidity

¹ Among these traitors to the state was a youth, A. Fulvius, the son of a senator, who, being arrested on his way and brought back, was put to death by his father's order. (Sall. B.C. 39.; Dion, xxxvii. 36; Val. Max. v. 8. 5.) This imitation of the discipline of the ancient republic excited neither applause nor indignation among the languid voluptuaries of the senate. Merimée, Etudes sur l'Histoire Romaine, ii. 188.

of his movements the spirit of disaffection which was beginning to manifest itself in either Gaul. He was at the head of three legions, with which he occupied Picenum and Umbria, and watched the northern flanks of the Apennines. Hasty and illconcerted risings in Bruttium and Apulia had also been speedily quelled ; yet, if Catilina could have burst from the toils by which he was surrounded, he might have taken advantage of the winter season to rouse rebellion throughout Italy, and have collected resources for another year's campaign.¹ The news of the detection and defeat of the conspiracy reached him in the neighbourhood of Fæsulæ. His first impulse was to make for Gaul, with which view he traversed the territory of Pistoria, and was about to cross the Apennines, when he found himself confronted by Metellus with firm resolution and superior numbers. Something might still be hoped from the favour or timidity of Antonius, and he turned again to throw himself upon the consular army. Antonius shut himself up under pretence of illness, and allowed the command to devolve upon Petreius, a veteran of unflinching fidelity. Catilina's undisciplined bands had no chance against their opponents as soon as they met in the field ; yet they fought to the last with the ferocity of wild beasts, unless, indeed, their devotion to their leader deserves a nobler title. Three thousand of their number were slain in the combat, and each man fell on the spot on which he had been marshalled for the battle. The body of Catilina himself was found far in advance of the line, among the corpses of the enemy, and the expression of his dying countenance still corresponded to the passions which had animated him in life.²

¹ Cic. pro Sest. 5.

² Sallust, B. C. 61.; Florus, iv. 1.; Dion, xxxvii. 39, 40. Catilina made his escape from Rome Nov. 9, A.U. 691, of the unreformed calendar, equivalent to Jan. 13, B.C. 62. The execution of his Differences between the leaders of the senate.

While the generals of the republic were still hunting the common enemy in the Apennines, and the machinations of his associates had not yet been brought to punishment, the leaders of the senate allowed themselves to quarrel among one another, as if they had no one to fear either within or without the city. The election of consuls for the ensuing year had fallen upon D. Junius Silanus and L. Licinius Murena. We have seen that Catilina had presumed to offer himself; but a worthier candidate, the great jurist Sulpicius, was also disappointed, and, resenting the notorious bribery employed by his rivals, had rushed to the prosecution of Murena. Cato, blinded by his hatred of corruption, or swayed by the self-appointed duty of chastising all political offenders, rashly consented to support the charge. It can hardly be supposed that the unsuccessful candidate had abstained from similar means, or came into court with clean hands. At all events, in the existing crisis of affairs, it was most important, that the executive should not be paralysed by depriving Silanus of his appointed colleague, and withdrawing his attention from the care of the public interests to the harassing duties incident to a fresh election. This Cicero saw, and immediately stepped forward to defend Murena, who, to his other claims on the confidence of his party, added the reputation, most valuable at such a moment, of a military commander.¹ The orator's exertions were successful, and his speech is more than usually interesting, from the tone of banter in which he indulges towards men in whom associates took place Dec. 5—Feb. 7., and he was slain in the beginning of the year 692—the middle of March, B. C. 62. Fischer, Zeittafeln, p. 221.

¹ The speech pro Murena was delivered after Catilina's retreat, but before the execution of his associates (c. 37.); Murena's military services are extolled (cap. 5. 9. 16.).

the senatorial party reposed the highest confidence; from the disparagement he throws, on the one hand, upon the legal science for which Sulpicius was justly celebrated, and upon the Stoic philosophy, on the other, of which Cato was the advocate and the pattern. In a subsequent work of more pretensions to sober argument Cicero alludes to this speech, and acknowledges that he had purposely adapted his rhetoric to the superficial understanding of the judges.¹ But this curious effusion of untimely levity must be ascribed to the intoxication of success. Cicero did not abstain from indulging his vanity in the arch depreciation of the chief men of his own party. Cato, who, with all his outward austerity, was a man of singular good-humour, smiled at his opponent, and quietly remarked to those about him how witty a consul the republic enjoyed.²

In the midst of their contentions for the highest office, the nobles had allowed Cæsar to obtain one of the second places in the scale of power, the prætorship, which he held in conjunction with M. Calpurnius Bibulus, the candidate of the opposite party. The most prominent among the tribunes at the same time were Cato and Metellus Nepos, a brother of Celer, the prætor of the preceding year. Nepos was an adherent of Pompeius, and was sent by him from Asia to canvass for the tribuneship, that on his own return he might secure the services of an ally in that important office. Cato, it was said, had resisted Cæsar prætor.

A. U. 692.
The nobles indicate their suspicions of
Pompeius.

¹ Cic. de Fin. iv. 27.; comp. Quintil. xi. 1.

² Plut. Cat. Min. 21. Niebuhr excuses Cicero's levity, and represents it as the innocent expression of natural cheerfulness and playful spirits on the happy termination of an arduous enterprize. (Lect. on Rom. Hist. ii. 29.) But the affair of Catilina had not yet reached its crisis; and though the consul might be confident that he possessed the means of crushing the enemy, his mind could not have been free from the deepest anxiety.

the solicitations of his friends to allow himself to be nominated for another seat on the tribunitian bench, declaring that the post was too invidious for one who was resolved not to swerve in the conduct of affairs from the strictest rules of probity and justice. But while journeying into Lucania, to escape from the turmoil of the approaching elections, he met Nepos, who had just landed at Brundisium. He knew or divined the object of this sudden arrival, and ordered his horses' heads to be turned towards Rome, resolved to defeat the election of a creature of Pompeius, or at least to place himself in a situation in which he might neutralize such baneful influence.¹ He sought and obtained the tribuneship, in which he was, at the same time, associated with the enemy whom he had set himself to watch, whose evil schemes he was prepared to counteract by the free exercise of his official veto.² Such were the suspicions of their once favourite champion which the leaders of the aristocracy now manifested to the world.

This early preparation for a year of violence and intrigue was amply justified by the events which followed. On the first of January, when the consuls entered upon their duties it was customary for all the chief men and dignitaries of the state to proceed to the Capitol, and there offer them their solemn greetings.³ Cæsar, however, instead of assisting in this act of official courtesy, took advantage of the absence of his colleagues and rivals to address the people in the forum, and to propose that Catulus should be deprived by their vote of the honours due poses to deprive Catulus of the honour of restoring the Capitol, but is defeated.

Cæsar pro-
A. U. 692.
B. C. 62.

¹ Plut. Cat. Min. 20.

² Cic. pro Mur. 3.

³ We find this custom alluded to a hundred and fifty years later by Pliny (Ep. ix. 37.): "Vides quam non delicata me causa obire primum consulatus tui diem non sinat: quam tamen hic, ut præsens, votis, gaudio, gratulatione celebrabo."

to him as the restorer of the temple of Jupiter, which was now on the point of completion.¹ That august edifice, the glory of the City and the Empire, had suffered severely in the conflagration which took place during the conflict of Sulla and Marius.² The charge of restoring it in a manner worthy of the extended greatness of the republic had been assigned to Catulus, as prince of the senate and the most illustrious of all her citizens.³ He had accepted the commission with pride, and bestowed infinite care on its execution, nor had he shrunk from incurring vast personal expense, that his name might deserve to be inscribed on its front by his grateful countrymen. Cæsar audaciously brought a charge of peculation against him, and demanded the production of his accounts; while at the same time he insisted that he should not be permitted to put the finishing hand to the work, but that the burden and the glory should be transferred to Pompeius.⁴ This attack was, perhaps, not seriously meant to succeed. It answered the purpose of enraging and alarming the nobles, of thwarting a personal enemy, above all of menacing the aristocracy with the vengeance of the chieftain they distrusted. It was also an overture of more cordial alliance between the pretended friends. But the nobles, on hearing what was passing, rushed from the presence of the consuls with all their friends and adherents, into the forum, and succeeded in averting the blow. The name of Lutatius Catulus was duly

¹ See Cic. ii. in Verr. iv. 31.

² Not by accident but designedly. Some charged Sulla, others Carbo, with having applied the torch. Tacitus, Hist. iii. 72., says, "fraude privata."

³ Sulla originally undertook it, but died before the work had proceeded far. This disappointment, it was said, was the only exception to the universal good fortune from which he obtained his surname of Felix. "Hoc solum felicitati ejus negatum." Tac. l. c.; comp. Plin. H.N. vii. 43.

⁴ Dion, xxxvii. 44. Suet. Jul. 15.

inscribed upon the noblest monument of the national pride, and bore witness to the glory of the most blameless hero of the aristocracy until the temple was again destroyed by fire in the civil wars of Vitellius and Vespasian.¹

Pompeius
desists from the pursuit of Mithridates, who forms a new combination against Rome,

The main object of the extraordinary powers which Pompeius enjoyed had been recently attained by the death of the terrible Mithridates, in the preceding year. The power of the eastern tyrant had been gradually broken by the perseverance of successive Roman generals, and he had been finally expelled from all the territories he had inherited or acquired on the southern shore of the Euxine. The ascendency which Pompeius had gained over his army, and probably the zealous assistance of the civil administrators throughout the east, whose extortions he had not chosen, like Lucullus, to check, gave him far more complete command of his resources than his predecessors ever possessed. Accordingly, he obtained an easy conquest over Tigranes, king of Armenia, and received his submission with favour upon payment of an adequate tribute.² He drove the king of Pontus beyond the Caucasus: but to pursue him further was a service of danger, for such a charm did the mighty monarch carry with him, even in exile and disgrace, that wherever he came the nations rose to welcome and obey him. Mithridates retreated round the north-eastern coasts of the Euxine, and halted at Pantic-

¹ Tac. I. c.; Suet. Vitell. 15. Dion (xlivi. 14.) says that the senate decreed (A.U. 708) that the name of Catulus should be erased, and that of Cæsar substituted. In modern times, indeed, an inscription has been found in the foundations of the tabularium bearing the name of Catulus: "Q. Lutatius Q. F. Q. N. Catulus substructionem et tabularium de s. s. faciendum coeravit." This, however, refers only to a small and inferior part of his work. The tabularium, the depository of the public archives, was built against the face of the Capitoline hill, upon a huge substruction of masonry between the two summits of that eminence.

² Vell. ii. 37.

peum, at the mouth of the Cimmerian Bosporus.¹ Pompeius relinquished the pursuit, and turned southwards in search of wealthier lands to plunder and feebler sovereigns to intimidate; while the enemy whom he had been specially commissioned to destroy was maturing a new combination against the power of Rome, more gigantic and formidable than any which his bold imagination had yet conceived. The same sagacity which, at an earlier period, had induced him to enter into negotiations with Sertorius in Spain, now counselled him to communicate with the restless warriors of Gaul. He proposed, it is said, to traverse Dacia and Pannonia with a Scythian horde at his back, and join his impatient allies at the threshold of Italy.² Even at the farthest extremity to which his power ever reached this extraordinary man could leave a durable name in the traditions of the native population: A ledge on the summit of a rock projecting into the sea, in the neighbourhood of Kertch, is said to be popularly known at this day as the throne of Mithridates.³ But the ordinary result of Oriental polygamy hastened the old man's end. He had excited against himself hostility in the bosom of his own family. Three sons and three daughters he had put to death to secure his throne, but another of his children named Pharnaces, whom he had destined for his successor, eager to defeat the wild enterprize he meditated, and thus gain the favour of the Romans, revolted against him. Deserted by his troops and people, Mithridates prepared to embrace a voluntary death. His system, it was affirmed, had been fortified against poison by the habitual use of antidotes; he was compelled to require but puts an end to his life on the revolt of his son

Pharnaces,
A.U.691.

¹ Appian, Bell. Mithrid. 107.

² Dion, xxxviii. 11.; Flor. iii. 5.; Appian, B. M. 109.: 'Εσ Κελτούς ἐκ πολλοῦ φίλους ἐπὶ τῷδε γεγονότας ἐπενθεὶ διελθὼν ἐς τὴν Ἰταλίαν σὺν ἐκείνοις ἐμβαλεῖν.

³ Michelet, Hist. Rom. iii. c. 4.

the services of a Gaulish attendant, and fell upon the sword reluctantly presented to him.¹

The treason of Pharnaces was rewarded with the kingdom of the Bosporus, and he was received by Pompeius into the friendship and alliance of the republic. Meanwhile the decrees of the Roman general at the head of his army had sufficed to annex many rich provinces to the empire. When Pompeius desisted from the pursuit of the king of Pontus, he repaired to the court of Antiochus, surnamed Asiaticus, in Syria, and ordered him to descend from the throne of the Seleucidæ, and surrender his country to the Roman people. This sovereign, the last of a dynasty which had wielded the sceptre of Syria for two centuries and a half, and had furnished a succession of seventeen kings², had entered upon his hereditary rule on the expulsion of Tigranes by the Roman arms. But the country was totally unable to defend itself against the Parthians and Armenians; it was too rich or too critically situated to be intrusted to a dependent monarch, and Pompeius reduced it without hesitation to the form of a province. Phœnicia and Cœle-Syria submitted to the same yoke without an audible murmur, and became incorporated in the proconsular government of Syria. At Damascus the conqueror received the appeal of Hyrcanus, who had been deprived by his younger brother Aristobulus of his sacerdotal sovereignty in Judea. He listened to the usurper's defence of his conduct in assuming the title of king; but he condescended to weigh the

Successes of Pompeius in Syria and Palestine.

¹ Dion; Appian; Liv. Epit. cii.

² Appian (B. Mithr. 70.) calculates the period at 270 years, and adds fourteen for the duration of the rule of Tigranes. He is manifestly in error. Seleucus began his reign B.C. 312, with which year his era commences (Clinton, Fast. Hell. in ann.); and from thence to B.C. 64 (A.U. 690) are 248 years complete. Various computations may be compared in the Art de Vérifier les Dates, ii. 337. ed. 8vo.

arguments of the Jewish statesmen and the usages of the nation, and finally undertook to restore Hyrcanus to power, and re-establish the ancient polity. The Jews, however, would not submit to foreign dictation. Aristobulus was their favourite. They wished, as of old, to have a king to reign over them. They defended their freedom of choice, and the object whom they had chosen, with all the valour and obstinacy of their race. For three months their temple-citadel held out against the skill and patience of the Romans: but the fanaticism of the people, which was kindled by the excitement of patriotism, proved their ruin; for, as on former occasions, their presumptuous confidence tempted them to omit the requisite means of defence, and their fastness was surprised during a season of unguarded ceremonial.¹ The victor replaced Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood and abolished the royal title. He made the country dependent upon Rome; but though he violated the Holy of Holies by his profane presence, he appears to have acted with more than usual moderation in sparing the sacred furniture and treasures of the temple.² If the death of Mithridates had been longer delayed, it was the intention of Pompeius to have made a campaign against the Nabathæans; and it would have been, we are assured, his idle ambition to penetrate to the eastern Ocean, as he had carried the arms of the republic in Spain to the shores of the Atlantic.³ But the change in the situation of affairs required his return to Asia Minor. He there completed the arrangements of his foreign policy, and gave his last directions for the settlement of the provincial administration. The basis upon which the edifice of social order had been established by Lucullus remained unshaken after his successor had left Asia.¹

¹ Josephus, Antiq. Jud. xiv. 4. 3.; Strabo, xvi. 2.: νηστεῖας ἡμέρᾳ.

² Dion (xxxvii. 16.) says the contrary: πάντα τὰ χρήματα διηρπάσθη: but the other is the statement in which the rest of our authorities concur. See Drumann, iv. 467. The spoliation of the temple of Jerusalem was reserved for Crassus.

³ This may, perhaps, be regarded as a rhetorical flight of Plutarch's, who amplifies it still further (Pomp. 38.).

The nobles make preparations against the designs imputed to Pompeius. A. v. 692. B. c. 62.

The zeal with which the nobles had rushed to the defence of Catulus could not fail to mortify the jealous temper of Pompeius, and their statesmen might regard the death of Mithridates with alarm rather than satisfaction, for nothing now remained to delay the conqueror's return to take account of their proceedings in his absence. In vain had Cato sneered at the feeble resistance of the Asiatics, and asserted that the successes of their conqueror were merely victories over women.² The power and ability of so great a captain were not to be charmed away by empty taunts. It was a better policy to fortify the position of the senate by courting the services of its most distinguished military members. Lucullus had lately received the long-delayed honour of a triumph: the technical objection that he had not actually finished the war in the East was overruled, and his real merits were not unduly rewarded by an unusual stretch of the senate's prerogative.³ This year, Q. Metellus, another scion of the same illustrious house which furnished a tribune at the late elections, and a prætor at the preceding, was flattered with a similar honour.⁴ He received, at the same time, the surname of Creticus, for his final reduction of the warlike islanders whom it had taken three years to subdue. But the importance of his victory was to be estimated, not so much by the resources or

¹ Cic. Acad. ii. 1.; comp. Plut. Pomp. 39.

² Cic. pro Mur. 14.

³ Cicero seems to claim the merit of having extorted this act of justice and good policy (Acad. ii. 1.): "Nos consules introduximus pæne in urbem currum clarissimi viri."

⁴ Vell. ii. 34.

valour of the natives, as by the convenience of the harbours and fastnesses of the island, protecting the commerce of the Mediterranean, and imposing a bridle upon piracy in the surrounding seas.¹

No sooner had Metellus Nepos arrived in Rome than he put himself in communication with Cæsar, and the two agitators combined together in harassing the party to which both were equally hostile. Nepos began his career as tribune by denouncing the execution of Catilina's associates.² He declaimed against it, on the one hand, as a crime against the people; on the other, as offensive to Pompeius, the saviour of the state and the champion of the constitution. Thus early were the nobles apprised of the pretext they had furnished to their protector should he choose to overthrow their power by force, and declare himself the avenger of a judicial murder. Under Cato's undaunted leadership, however, they mustered all their courage. Cicero himself presented a bold front to his accusers; and the people for once were not forgetful of the preservation of their homes and hearths by his patriotic vigour. On the first day of the new year, when the consul was about to lay down his office and to make the customary oration to the people, the tribune offered to impose silence upon him, declaring it unfit that the murderer of Roman citizens should address an assembly of free men. Amidst the uproar which this act excited, Cicero could only exclaim, with a solemn adjuration, that he had saved the state, and the general acclamations of the people overwhelmed every opposing whisper.³ Yet it might seem to him ominously

¹ Even the plunder of Crete deserved to be recorded among the spoils of much ampler domains. Lucan, iii. 163. The pirates had probably accumulated treasures there.

² Dion, xxxvii. 42.; Plut. Cic. 23.

³ Cic. ad Div. v. 1, 2. Plutarch (Cic. l.c.) attributes the favour with which Cicero was received to the good offices of Cato, who was significant that this innocent or necessary act of self-defence was resented by Celer, the brother of Nepos. Metellus Celer, though now enjoying the proconsulship of Gaul through Cicero's surrender of his own prior claim, and though professing himself his friend both personally and politically, was unreasonable enough to address him in a letter of bitter remonstrance, to which his correspondent replied with becoming spirit.

The attack was repulsed. But Catilina had not yet been defeated; and the tribune now moved a rogation to the people for recalling Pompeius with his troops, and giving him full powers for the destruction of the common enemy. The senate shrank from offering any such invitation; it would rather have thrown some obstacle in the way of his return, and rejoiced in the dilatoriness of his present proceedings. It exerted all its influence to thwart the odious proposal. The part Cæsar was playing now became manifest. He appeared as the counsellor and confidant of the demagogue, whose violence was destroying all hope of reconciliation between the oligarchs and their former leader. The tribune had occupied the forum with a crowd of his own adherents. He presented, moreover, a startling array of military force, whether to protect his own inviolable person, or to overawe his opponents. Scarcely could Cato, who would not be withheld from appearing by the advice and entreaties of his friends, succeed in making his way to the spot where the functionaries of the state presided over the first to address him as the "Father of his country." Plutarch is not correct, perhaps, in saying that Cicero was the first who received this honourable distinction; at all events, he was the last, while the voice of the Roman people continued really free: "Roma patrem patriæ Ciceronem libera dixit." Juvenal, viii. 244. Comp. however Plin. H.N. vii. 31. "Salve primus omnium parens patriæ appellate."

Violence of the tribune Nepos, triumph of the nobles.

the popular assembly. Cæsar and Nepos were sitting side by side. Cato advanced and took his seat directly between them, to interrupt their private communications. Nepos directed the clerk to read the proposed resolution aloud; Cato forbade him. Nepos took the paper himself; Cato snatched it from his hand, and tore it in the face of the multitude. This boldness warmed the people in his favour, when Nepos, furious at being thus thwarted, began to recite the resolution from memory. Thermus, another of the tribunes and an adherent of the nobles, raised his hand to the speaker's mouth. This was a violent way of interposing the official veto, the means of control which each tribune legally possessed over his colleagues; but it hit the humour of the excited multitude, and was crowned with tumultuous acclamation. A scene of riot and disorder followed, which prevented the adoption of any measure under the sanction of legal forms; and although it was necessary for the friends of Cato to hurry him from the strife, and to secure his safety hard by in the temple of Castor and Pollux, the object of Nepos was defeated, and a great triumph obtained for the insulted senate.¹

But the aristocratic party was fated always to push its victories too far. The senate, elated by the unaccustomed sounds of popular applause, ventured to suspend both Nepos and Cæsar from the functions to which they had been duly elected. The tribune fled to the camp of his patron, proclaiming that the sanctity of his office had been profaned by violence. Cæsar, with greater resolution, threw himself upon the protection of his allies and adherents, and continued to administer his prætorial functions in defiance of every hostile menace. He refused to quit his tribunal

The nobles venture to insult Cæsar, and are compelled to make reparation.

¹ Plut. Cat. Min. 26—30. Dion, xxxvii. 43.

till compelled by a military force, whereupon he dismissed the lictors who attended upon him, divested himself of his official insignia, and retired with dignity to his private dwelling. The populace now assembled to avenge the insult offered to their favourite. A riot ensued, which compelled the consuls to retrace their steps, not without the most obsequious expressions of respect and deference towards him.¹ But how hollow these compliments were, how insincere the show of reconciliation, appears from a fresh attempt which was made at the same moment to implicate him in the late conspiracy, the inquiry into which was still in progress. The ostensible promoters of the charge were L. Vettius and Q. Curius, both men of notorious character, who had already sold themselves to the senate, and denounced the plot in which they had in fact been deeply engaged.² Vettius declared that he could produce letters from Cæsar to Catilina; Curius only professed to have ascertained his guilt from the mouth of their common leader. It is hardly credible that these wretches would have ventured to assail the popular champion, whose courage and resources were so well known, had not they received direct encouragement from some chiefs of the senate. Cæsar, with his usual decision, went straightway to Cicero, and engaged him to remove any suspicion of his criminality. The late consul declared publicly that it was by Cæsar himself that the first intimation of the danger had been made to him. Whether this had really been the fact does not appear; but, at all events, the testimony of Cicero could not be discredited. Not only was Cæsar acquitted, but the reward recently assigned to Curius as the supposed revealer of the plot, was taken from him, and handed to the object of his calumny. Vettius was sacrificed to the wrath of the people, and thrown into prison; nor did Novius the quæstor, who had allowed his superior magistrate to be cited before his tribunal, escape a similar chastisement.¹

¹ Suet. Jul. 16. This incident is omitted by all the other authorities, and Plutarch expressly declares that no tumults occurred in Cæsar's prætorship, Cæs. 9.

² Dion, xxxvii. 41.; Sallust, BC. 17.

Another incident occurred during Cæsar's prætorship, which is cited by his biographer as an instance of his zeal in defending the clients who intrusted their interests to his care.²

Cæsar protects Masintha in defiance of the senate.

It is so briefly related that we are at a loss fully to understand it; but it seems at least to give further indications of the confidence he now felt in his position, and the spirit of defiance which animated all his transactions with the government. A Numidian chieftain named Masintha had applied to Cæsar to defend him against a claim for tribute on the part of his sovereign Hiempsal. The king sent his son Juba to Rome, to take the proper measures for having the cause decided by the tribunals of the republic; for Numidia had recently been constituted a Roman dependency by Pompeius, and the senate assumed the right of determining the political relations of the ruler and his vassals. The republic declared in favour of the royal claim: and Cæsar, it seems, did not abstain from personally insulting Juba, whose beard he pulled in derision. But the majesty of Rome he insulted even more gravely; for when it was decided that Masintha should be delivered to Juba for the punishment of his contumacy, Cæsar snatched him from the hands of the officers, and carried him to his own house. There, our informant assures us, Masintha was kept in concealment, or rather, we must suppose, in open defiance of the government, which could not have been ignorant of his retreat, till the praetor departed for Spain some months later, and assigned him a place in his suite.

¹ Suet. Jul. 17.

² Suet. Jul. 71. This occurrence is not mentioned by any other writer.

At length fortune seemed to offer an opportunity

Early life and character of Clodius. to the nobles for creating disunion among their adversaries. While Cæsar, by the ascendency of his character and genius, maintained throughout his career the chief estimation among his party, the giddy multitude had other favourites besides him; and among them was P. Clodius, a young man of very dissolute habits, but not without ambition to court, and address to engage, its admiration.¹ Connected with several of the principal men of the state, Clodius enjoyed every advantage in the outset of his public life. He was admitted to the confidence of Lucullus in Asia, which he betrayed by exciting a mutiny in the ranks, the first occasion on which he essayed the arts of a demagogue.² Marcius Rex, when commanding in Sicilia, had placed a portion of the fleet under the young man's control, with which he fell into the hands of the pirates.³ Released by the intervention of Pompeius, he betook himself to Antioch, thrust himself into the affairs of the Syrians, and narrowly escaped death in the disturbances he there excited. Having thus succeeded in embroiling every affair in which he had taken part, he returned to Rome, and assumed the character of a patriot. His attack upon Catilina was specious and daring, but its failure threw a further shade upon his reputation.⁴ Though involved in the common suspicion of a guilty acquaintance with the conspirators' designs, he avowed himself a supporter of Cicero in the process against them.⁵ Meanwhile, he was no less intent upon beguiling the women than upon quarrelling with the men, and his tri-

¹ Vell. ii. 45.: "P. Clodius, homo nobilis, disertus, audax."

² Plut. Luc. 34.

⁴ Cic. ad. Att. i. 1.

³ Dion, xxxv. 15.

⁵ Cic. de Har. Resp. 3.; Plut. Cic. 29.

umphs seemed destined to be confined to the weaker sex. The odious charge that he lived in incest with his sisters can only be regarded as a current tale of scandal, the truth of which it would be preposterous to assume.¹ But he was at least a favoured admirer of Pompeia, the wife of Cæsar; and it was in the prosecution of an intrigue with that illustrious matron that he perpetrated an act, the discovery of which raised him to a disgraceful notoriety, and well nigh created fatal dissension in the ranks of the popular party.

The Bona Dea, an old Italian divinity, whom the antiquaries of superstition sought to identify with various Greek and Latin goddesses, enjoyed the honour of a peculiar festival, at which none but women were allowed to attend. The presence of any of the male sex was deemed a pollution, and expected to bring a curse upon the nation. The intruder, it was once devoutly believed, would be visited with the loss of his sight; but no instance had yet been known of the wrath of the goddess being tempted to this extremity. The festival was held in the month of December², in the mansion of one of the consuls or prætors, and the mistress of the house was entitled to preside at it. The matrons of Rome were assembled at night under the roof of Pompeia, in the official dwelling of the chief pontiff, at the foot of the Palatine hill, a spot which may still be traced by the two half-buried columns of the temple of Romulus and Remus, which stood directly over against it. The beardless gallant introduced himself into the house in the garb of a female musician; he had corrupted one of the maids, and sent the mysteries of the Bona Dea.

He profanes

¹ Cic. de Har. Resp. 20.. ad Div. i. 9.: “Qui non pluris fecerat Bonam Deam quam tres sorores.” The three sisters were married respectively to Marcius Rex, L. Lucullus, and Metellus Celer. The last was the Clodia whose gallantries and political intrigues are so frequently stigmatized by Cicero. Drumann, ii. 874. foll.

² Drumann, ii. 204. note.

her to acquaint Pompeia of his arrival. The appointment had probably been concerted. But meanwhile he incautiously allowed himself to be seen by another attendant. Being addressed, his person or his voice immediately betrayed him.¹ The alarm was given and the utmost consternation prevailed. Aurelia, the mother of Cæsar, a Roman matron of the ancient stamp², who professed to keep strict watch over the virtue of her daughter-in-law, speedily threw a veil over the mysteries of the goddess, and rushed through the house, a torch in her hand, to discover the intruder. He was surrounded and recognised, but allowed to escape.³ The matrons who had assembled to assist at the ceremony dispersed to their homes, and none of them failed to inform her husband that night of the interruption of the rites and the pollution of the city. The next day the story was bruited far and wide, and the cry of indignation and fear resounded over the seven hills.

Such a moment of general panic presented the advisers of the aristocracy with a golden opportunity, and it was with no religious feeling, for Cicero himself scoffs at the goddess who failed to strike the impious intruder blind⁴, that they consulted the pontiffs and the Vestal virgins, from whom they received a formal assurance that the crime demanded signal expiation. Cæsar, as the chief of the pontifical college, could not abstain from coinciding in this solemn declaration. His guilty consort he publicly repudiated; but he denied all knowledge of her gallant, and refused to proceed against the

The nobles attempt to turn this transaction to a political account, but are baffled by Cæsar.

¹ Cic. ad. Att. i. 12.; Plut. Cic. 28.; Dion, xxxvii. 45.

² Comp. the author of the Dial. de Orat. c. 28.: "Sic Corneliam Gracchorum, sic Aureliam Cæsaris, sic Atiam Augusti matrem præfuisse educationibus ac produxisse principes liberos accepimus."

³ "Aurelia pro testimonio dixit suo jussu eum esse dimissum." Schol. Bob. in Orat. in Clod. et Curion. 5. 3.

⁴ Cic. pro Dom. 40.

intriguer, whom the city unanimously denounced. This was the point at which his enemies were aiming. A man of Cæsar's influence might have insured the criminal's conviction; at all events, it was obvious that, by invoking punishment upon Clodius, he would incense many of their common friends, and during a long and bitter struggle a thousand incidents might occur to widen the breach in their party. But though disappointed in this hope, the nobles would not let their victim escape. According to the ordinary mode of procedure in cases which were confined to questions of fact, the judges were selected by lot for the decision of each particular cause from the list of one hundred and five, previously drawn by lot also from the three orders of senators, knights, and ærarian tribunes. But, whether the charge against Clodius was one for which there was no exact precedent, or whether its importance might be held to justify a departure from the usual course, the senate wished the judges to be assigned by the direct appointment of the prætor. This also was a method not unknown to the constitution; and though the advantage it offered to the nobles seems obvious, we do not hear that it was regarded by their opponents as unjust or invidious. Accordingly, the new consuls, Pupius Piso and Messala, were enjoined to invoke the people to sanction this mode of procedure. Messala engaged in the business with good faith; but his colleague was easily won over by the enemy, and allowed obstacles to be thrown in the way of the enactment which he himself proposed. Cato pushed the matter forward with his usual promptitude; Cicero joined in the general outcry, always hoping to be floated to the top in every current of popular opinion; but he dared not commit himself to active measures. Pompeius was expected daily with his army at the gates of Rome; all parties were in-

A.U. 693.
B.C. 61.

triguing with him, but no one yet knew what his judgment in the matter might be ; it was the part of prudent men not to put themselves too prominently forward at so critical a moment.

Before the close of the first month in the year 693, the conqueror of the east reached the shores of Italy. No sooner did he touch the land than he falsified the apprehensions of the city by disbanding his host of veterans, with the promise of ample rewards, which he felt secure of obtaining from the senate and people.¹ The senate received the news with surprise, gratification, and premature contempt. But there was neither difficulty nor dishonour in affecting gratitude, and the great captain was escorted into the city with the liveliest demonstrations of respect and joy. His entry into Rome was the celebration, it was said, of a triumph, not over the kings of Asia, but over himself, the heir of Sulla, the child of the proscriptions.² When the pageant was over, the proconsul required time to cast his eyes around him, and assure himself that he comprehended the posture of affairs. Meanwhile, his conduct in every respect was studiously moderate. Every word he uttered was noted and treasured up by innumerable ears, every movement was watched and criticized ; all parties hung in suspense, and awaited in silence the declaration of his sentiments. But amongst all parties he found no friend ; perhaps he sought none : his coldness and vanity were equally repulsive, and he was too fearful of committing himself by premature disclosures to court the intimacy of any one. Among the number of those who crowded about him and tendered advice and service, it is probable that Cæsar acquired his usual ascendancy, unsettling his views and shaking his resolutions.

¹ The reception of Pompeius, and the whole proceedings in Clodius's trial, are related with great liveliness by Cicero in two of his letters to Atticus, i. 14, 16.

² Drumm. iv. 479. : comp. Dion, xxxvii. 5 ; Plut. Pomp. 43. ; Vell. ii. 40.

Pompeius reaches Italy, disbands his army, and enters the city as a private man.

The first harangue which the new-comer made to the senate was so cautiously worded, that no indication whatever of his thoughts could be drawn from it. The coldness of his demeanour before that assembly might raise a fear that he reserved his animation for the forum, and his confidence for the popular demagogues. At the instigation of the consul Piso, Fufius Calenus, one of the tribunes in the interest of Clodius, stepped forward and invited him to address the people in the Flaminian Circus. On his appearance there, Fufius demanded of him, in direct terms, whether he approved the rogation of the consuls, by which the judges in the forthcoming trial were to be assigned by the prætor. Pompeius parried the thrust: his answer, as Cicero triumphantly proclaimed, was that of a true aristocrat; he made a laboured speech, with many unmeaning words, in which he magnified the authority and majesty of the senate, and professed to regard it with devout veneration. The consul Messala was encouraged by this apparent overture to ask his opinion, when he next presented himself in the senate, on the affair of Clodius and the proceedings of the government. But the crafty dissembler again shrank within himself; his reply was courteous but vague, and was limited to a general approbation of the behaviour of the nobles. He then turned to Cicero, and expressed a hope that he had said enough on that point. The applause with which even this guarded language was received, induced Crassus to rise and deliver a studied panegyric upon the conduct of Cicero in the grave affairs of his recent consulship. Cicero, sitting next to the object of universal attention, and watching every

He expresses himself with great reserve on public affairs.

turn in his countenance, thought that he perceived a gleam of approbation stealing over it. He rose to take advantage of the favourable moment, and enlarged, with his usual copious rhetoric, on the dangers from which the state had been preserved, and his own share in the glory of the deed. He spoke, as he alone could speak, of the dignity of the senatorial order, the good feeling of the knights, the favourable attitude of the Italians, the paralysis of every element of disaffection, the cheapness of provisions, the security of the commonwealth.¹ The senate responded, to the speaker's entire satisfaction ; it was the crowning day of Cicero's vanity ; yet one triumph was wanting to it, Pompeius would not be drawn into any further indication of his views.

When the day came for moving the rogation, the Proceedings against Clo-dius : these end in failure:

disappointment of the nobles. Clo-dius meditates vengeance.

friends of Clodius, the remnant, as Cicero invidiously asserts, of the Catilinarian crew, with the younger Curio, a reckless demagogue and spendthrift, at their head, attempted to defeat the influence of the nobles by various irregular manœuvres. But the opposite party displayed more than usual vigour; Cato, Hortensius and Favorinus, Cato's shadow², spoke with energy in the cause of justice, and the assembly at last separated without coming to a decision. Once more the senate met, and resolved in favour of the rogation by a majority of four hundred to fifteen, notwithstanding the personal entreaties of the accused. Clodius's addresses met with no other success than that of raising a laugh against Cicero, whom the oligarchs were never displeased to see made ridiculous. The mover of the rogation, fortified by the concurrence of this overwhelming majority, would now have beaten down all opposition; but Hortensius, by an unlucky scruple, counselled concession at the last moment, and waived the essential point in question, the assignment of the judges by the prætor. The guilt he deemed to be so manifest that the culprit's escape was impossible; a sword of lead, he said, would suffice to slay him; the concession would be graceful in appearance, while it could have no evil consequence. But he was deceived. Fifty-six judges were chosen by lot, a mode of selection which no doubt in itself admitted of much false play; at all events, there were many among them whose poverty and bad character cast equal suspicion on their honesty. The friends of Clodius strained every nerve to seduce them¹: money was showered upon them, promises were lavished without stint; the noblest and fairest women of Rome were induced to grant them their favours; the corruption of this infamous tribunal became a by-word to succeeding generations.² Yet the testimony which was produced against the accused seemed to make his escape impossible; his own plea, that he was absent at Interamna on the night in question, was refuted by the direct evidence of Cicero³; the mother of the injured husband asserted her knowledge of his guilt; the slaves of the house confessed it under torture⁴: one word from Cæsar would have sufficed to settle the matter; but

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 14. : "Quid multa? totum hunc locum, quem ego varie meis orationibus soleo pingere, de flamma, de ferro,—nasti illas ληκύθους,—valde pertexui." Compare as specimens of these ληκυθοί, the Orat. in Pis. 2., pro Mur. 39.

² Drumann, ii. 209.

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 16. 5.: "Arcessivit ad se, promisit, intercessit, dedit," &c.

² Seneca, Ep. 97.: "Atqui dati judicibus nummi sunt; et quod hac etiam nunc pactione turpius est, stupra insuper matronarum et adolescentulorum nobilium salarii loco exacta sunt."

³ Cic. pro Mil. 17.; Quintil. iv. 2. 88.

⁴ Schol. Bob. in Orat. in Clod. vi. 3. Abra (the Greek "Αἴρα" may perhaps be written more correctly in Latin Aura), the servant of Pompeia, was put to the question. It would appear from Cicero, pro Milon. 22. that the slaves of Clodius were tortured also: "de servis nulla quæstio est in dominum nisi de incestu, ut fuit in Clodium."

that word nothing could extort from him. Then why divorce Pompeia? cried the nobles in their vexation; the reply was adroit and spirited: *The wife of Cæsar must be above suspicion.*¹ The eloquence of Cicero carried even the multitude with him, and the judges affected to be terrified by the demonstrations of popular disgust. They demanded a military guard for their protection, while Catulus asked, with bitter irony, if they feared to have their pockets picked of their bribes. The cause was at last decided in favour of Clodius by thirty-one suffrages against twenty-five, a less proportion, perhaps, than might have been expected from the composition of the tribunal. The nobles consoled themselves as they best might, by the evidence so narrow a majority gave to the substantial justice of their cause, and to the bias of public opinion; but they were more sorely disappointed at failing to create that dissension between Cæsar and his friends which they had fondly anticipated. It was upon Cicero, however, that the real force of the blow rebounded. He had made an implacable enemy of one with whom he had hitherto cultivated terms of amity: and from henceforth Clodius seemed to devote every faculty he possessed to the prosecution of a memorable revenge.

Cæsar could afford to smile at the impotent machinations of his enemies; the prætorship had opened to him the path to the high fortune he coveted. Thus far he had succeeded in every political step. He had obtained the civic honours in succession, and he wielded at the moment almost unequalled influence. But his rivals were powerful in the field: Lucullus and Crassus, as well as Pompeius, were experienced generals; they had gained the attachment of armies; they could raise troops with a stamp of the foot; and when raised they could lead the government of a province,

Cæsar assumes

¹ Suet. Jul. 74.; Plut. Cæs. 10., Cic. 29.

them to victory. Cæsar, on the other hand, had neither veterans at his command, nor means to levy recruits. His name was unknown in war, and was no watchword to the aspirants either for plunder or for glory. But now his turn was come. Assured that the parties in the state were so nicely balanced that no material change could suddenly occur in the political game, he determined to retire to the Further Spain, the province which had been assigned to him on the expiration of his late office, there put himself at the head of a Roman army, and store his coffers with the spoils accruing whether from war or peace. But such were his private embarrassments that he could not even leave Rome for his destination without one more extraordinary effort. His private means had been long exhausted. The friends who had continued to supply his necessities had seemed to pour their treasures into a bottomless gulf; so vast was his expenditure in shows, canvasses and bribes; so long and barren the career of public service, through which this ceaseless profusion must be maintained. At this period when the bold gamester was about to throw his last die, he could avow that he wanted two hundred and fifty millions of sesterces to be worth nothing. Before he could enter upon the administration of his province he had pressing creditors to satisfy and expensive preparations to make. Every other resource perhaps had been exhausted, but Cæsar could apply to Crassus for a loan.¹ The wealthiest of the Romans hated the great captain Pompeius, and he saw in Cæsar the readiest instrument for lowering his estimation. He held in pawn the treasures of Iberia. The sum required was 830 talents, and this was placed at once in Cæsar's hands.²

¹ Plut. Crass. 7. Cæs. 11. Appian, B.C. ii. 8.

² Plut. Cæs. 11.: Ἐπὶ Κράσσου κατέφυγε πλουσιώτατον ὄντα Ρωμαίων δεδμένον δὲ τῆς Καλσαρος ἀκμῆς καὶ θερμότητος ἐπὶ τὴν πρὸς Πομπήιον ἀντιπολιτείαν.

and baffles the project of his enemies to detain him at Rome.

The delay however which these arrangements required was nearly fatal to the propraetor's expédition. For in the meanwhile the senate was occupied with the affair of Clodius; and a decree was passed, no doubt with special reference to Cæsar, that the prætors should not depart for their provinces until it had been discussed and finally settled. Accordingly, the details of his commission had not been arranged, the sum which the state should contribute to his expenses, the number of the troops to be entrusted to him, the names of those who were to constitute his retinue, were not determined, when Cæsar, resolved not to allow his designs to be frustrated, suddenly left Rome in the middle of the year, and betook himself to his province in defiance of every impediment. He had reason to apprehend that a scheme was in contemplation to retain him at home by a political impeachment¹; but he knew that when once at the head of his legions, his enemies would not dare to recal him, and he trusted to reap such a harvest, both of treasure and reputation, as would divert the effects of their malice on his return.

The whole of ancient Iberia was divided at this time into two provinces, the Hither and the Further.² The former extended from the Pyrenees along the coast of the Medi-

The Roman provinces in Spain.

¹ Suet. Jul. 18.: "Incertum, metune judicii quod privato parabatur, an quo maturius sociis implorantibus subveniret."

² Spain; Hispania, Iberia: the former name was given by the Carthaginians to the south-western extremity of the peninsula, and was probably a Phœnician word. The rough breathing and sibilation are characteristic of their appellations: comp. Hasdrubal, Hiempsal, Thapsus, Ruspina, Hispalis, Hispania, Hesperia (?). The Romans adopted the name from them. On the other hand, the Greek geographers gave the country the name of Iberia, which may have been derived, through the Massilian traders, from the river Iberus. But it is probable that the earliest population of all the north and centre called themselves Iberians. Plin. H. N. iii. 3.: "Iberus—amnis, quem propter universam Hispaniam Græci appellavere Iberiam." Comp. Mannert, Geog. i. 227.

ranean to the Sinus Urcitanus, near the south-eastern angle of the peninsula. The line of the sea-shore was studded with numerous Roman settlements: the Celtiberi, occupying the central parts of the country, from whence the great rivers take their rise, had been conquered at an early period, and were rapidly assimilating to the type of the victorious nation¹; the brief season of their education under Sertorius had already borne fruit in a spirit of discipline and obedience. But, throughout the northern districts, the limits of the province, as well as of the Roman authority, were less clearly defined. The Cantabri, Vaccæi, Astures and Callaici, the remnant of the old and unmixed Iberian stock, maintained among barren mountains their sullen independence. The southern and western portion of the peninsula constituted the further province, which was afterwards subdivided into two, the Anas or Guadiana forming the line of demarcation between them.² The coast of the Mediterranean and the valley of the Bætis were the abodes of wealth and luxury, of art and science; but even these favoured districts were liable to the sudden attacks of savage neighbours, and the vigilance of the provincial government was constantly exercised in protecting the central retreats of peaceful civilization.

Having thus invested himself, as it were, with the government of his province, the proprætor proceeded to raise ten cohorts from his own resources, in addition to the twenty which were stationed in the country. The tribes of Lusitania, beyond the Tagus, had never yet accepted the Roman yoke, and behind them lay the mountains of Gallicia, which harboured a race to whom even the

Cæsar's successful campaign in Spain.

¹ They were subdued by the arms and artifice of Cato the Censor, about A.U. 557. Appian, Hisp. 41.

² Cæs. Bell. Civ. i. 38.: "A saltu Castulonensi ad Anam."

name of the republic was almost unknown. The provincial governors lived in a state of almost perpetual warfare with the petty chieftains, whose nominal dependence was marked by the imposition of a tribute, seldom paid except when exacted by arms. The necessity of self-defence might excuse the repeated incursions by which they restrained the hungry wanderers on their frontiers. But Cæsar was not satisfied with the mere avowal of submission; he required a guarantee for its permanence: he carried war into the fastnesses of the mountains, and drove the enemy from his retreats into the open plains. Nor was he diverted from his purpose by the booty which the natives craftily threw in his way; he thrust home at the main body of his opponents, pursued them over broad rivers, drove them to the borders of the sea, and into islands on the coasts. He collected vessels from Gades, and with their assistance finally reduced these last strongholds. He thus effected the complete subjugation of the districts of Lusitania north of the Tagus, including the wild fastnesses of the Herminian mountains and the rapid waters of the Durius. Brigantium in Gallicia, protected on the land side by the difficult character of the surrounding country, he attacked with a naval armament, and erected his victorious standard at the furthest extremity of his province.¹

¹ Brigantium seems to have been either the modern Ferrol or Coruña. Mannert decides for the former, but the remains of an old Roman tower near the latter place may remind us that Brigantium was celebrated for its lighthouse. (Oros. i. 2.) The two modern towns, however, lie nearly opposite to each other across a bay, and the lighthouse might serve as a beacon to vessels bound for either destination. The Mons Herminius is supposed by both Drumann and Mannert to have lain south of the Tagus, but it would rather appear from Dion's account to have been situated near the Douro. It may probably be identified with the Sierra d'Estrella in the province of Beira. The authorities for the history of this campaign, important only as a prelude to Cæsar's great military achievements, are Plutarch, Cæs. 12.; Dion, xxxvii. 52. 53.

The success of the new candidate for military fame gave a brilliant earnest of his future glories. The brief space which he could devote to ^{His civil ad-}ministration. civil affairs must have been employed with at least equal energy. The great complaint of the provincials, throughout the Roman dominions, was the pressure of their debts to the government. The farmers of the public revenues exacted their dues with scrupulous severity. But as capitalists they were prompt in accommodating the natives with usurious loans, and thus extricating them from immediate difficulties at an enormous eventual sacrifice. The revenues, not of individuals only, but of cities and states, became mortgaged beyond the possibility of redemption. The persons of the debtors and of their families were liable to be seized and sold into slavery. When the affair came to this point, we may imagine how ready a refuge was offered to the victim by the bands of brigands in the mountains. The administration of Cæsar was directed to the abolition of this cause of perennial warfare. He effected an adjustment by which these debts were to be liquidated by instalments, and is said to have conciliated, by his wisdom and prudence, the good-will of either party. The tribute which had been imposed upon the province by Metellus Pius, during the Sertorian war, was remitted by the senate at the proprætor's instance; upon which service he founded a just claim to the gratitude of the Spanish people.¹ But meanwhile the main object of his own visit to the country was not neglected. He amassed a considerable treasure for himself, and took care to satisfy the cupidity of his followers and soldiers in due proportion.² The army saluted him on the field with the title of Imperator.

¹ Auct. de B. Hisp. 42.

² Suetonius, in a passage where he rakes together all the charges which were made against the subject of his memoir during his lifetime and afterwards (Jul. 54.), says that he was accused of accepting

Pompeius
presses the senate to ratify his acts.

During the absence of Cæsar, Pompeius continued slowly and irresolutely to press upon the senate the ratification of his acts in the eastern wars. He had expended large sums of money in the service of the state, he had levied contributions from subjects and allies, he had conferred privileges upon cities and crowns upon political partisans. All this he had done in the exercise of his own plenary discretion, under the extraordinary powers of the Manilian law; nevertheless, he was anxious that his proceedings should be confirmed by a special decree of the senate, to relieve him from all future responsibility. But that body was well pleased to have an opportunity of humiliating the haughty general. Lucullus, more particularly, grudged the distinctions of his rival and successor in the eastern command¹, and insinuated that he had been himself the first to break the power of Mithridates, leaving him an easy prey to a fresh adversary with augmented resources. And the tyrant had, after all, escaped from his pursuer, and robbed the pretended conqueror of half his glory by a voluntary death.²

Pompeius's triumph.
A. U. 698.
Sept. 22, 23.

The senate listened with approbation to these petulant objections, and gradually recovered its courage in the presence of one who had so lately been the master of its legions.

It had concealed its enmity under a flourish of acclamations when Pompeius entered Rome, accomresents from individuals, and even soliciting them. This is not improbable, but no one seems to have made any charge against him of fraud or rapine in his civil administration. His enemies, with all their unscrupulous animosity, never threatened to bring his conduct as a provincial governor before a judicial tribunal. Cæsar's proprætorship was an object of panegyric among his countrymen. Comp. Cic. pro Balb. 19.; Vell. ii. 43.; Plut. Cæs. 12.

¹ Plut. Pomp. 46.

² Lucan (i. 336.) puts this depreciating language in the mouth of Cæsar:

“Lassi Pontica regis Prælia, barbarico vix consummata veneno.”

panied, not by his troops, but a crowd of flatterers and courtiers.¹ The studied modesty of his bearing roused the presumption of the nobles, in the same degree that it allayed their jealousy. He would not accept any title to designate the theatre of his conquests, and perpetuate their memory in connexion with his name. He was content with the simple appellation of Magnus, the Great, which had been sanctioned by the popular voice at an earlier period, and which, in a single word, more than comprised all local designations.² He further declined any mark of public approbation, except the permission to wear a laurel chaplet and the triumphal insignia at the games of the Circus.³ Meanwhile, he exhibited the spectacle of his triumph, such as Rome had never before seen.⁴ It was not so remarkable for the munificence of the festivals which attended it, or for the public shows in the theatre and Circus, as for the interest and value of spoils which decorated it. The treasures of Mithridates, collected from the plunder of Greece, were not restored to the sufferers, but reserved to enrich the friends of the latest victor. Works of painting and statuary were eclipsed by vast hoards of plate, and the novel luxury of gems, pearls and crystal vases. The taste, indeed, for these objects in Rome dated its introduction from this auspicious event⁵;

¹ Vell. ii. 40.: "Quo magis homines timuerant, eo gravior civilis tanti imperatoris redditus fuit."

² Ovid, Fast. i. 603.

"Magne, tuum nomen rerum mensura tuarum est."

³ Dion, xxxvii. 21.: Vell. l.c. observes: "Id ille non plus quam semel, et hoc sane nimium fuit, usurpare sustinuit." The glories of the triumph were a giddy elevation which furnished a constant theme to the moralists. Nemesis could hardly endure the provocation of seeing a mortal sitting among his fellow-citizens in the robe in which he had thrice ridden to the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. "Velamina summo Ter conspecta Jovi." Luc. ix. 177.

⁴ Comp. Plutarch's elaborate account, Pomp. 45.

⁵ Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 7.

so rapid was the transition the Romans made from
 A. U. 694. the old Italian simplicity to a puerile
 B. C. 60. delight in mere brilliancy and rarity and meretricious ornament.¹

This harmless gratification of his vanity, however,
 He presses for did not avail to advance the immediate an agrarian object of Pompeius's interest. The soldiers law for the he had disbanded at Brundisium required satisfaction of the fulfilment of the ample promise of lands his veterans. which he had held out to them. Sulla had demanded estates for his veterans; why should not Pompeius extort a similar gratification? But the copy had not the boldness of the original; the vision of the dict-torship still eluded his grasp. He attempted to gain his point by management suited to the times;
 but in this also he failed, from want of adroitness. He had secured, by the ordinary methods of corruption, the election of two consuls for the year 694, on whose political or private sentiments he ventured to rely.² But the one, L. Afranius, was a mere cypher among statesmen, one, says Cicero, who did not know the value of the thing he had

¹ Pompeius is the first Roman who can be confidently charged with the bad taste of allowing himself to be represented by a naked statue. This was the fashion which the Greeks applied to the representation of deities and heroes, and it consortied suitably with features of ideal beauty and majesty. In the Roman emperors the combination of the naked figure, with the ordinary human head, trimmed and curled according to the fashion of the day, is generally ludicrous. The emperors, however, who claimed kindred with the divinities, were not altogether inconsistent. But a naked figure of a Roman citizen, before the age of apotheoses, was preposterous and unmeaning. Pompeius was probably misled by personal vanity, for he was one of the handsomest men of his day. (Plut. Pomp. 2.: Plin. H.N. vii. 10.; Vell. ii. 29.) The famous statue in the Palazzo Spada at Rome, which is supposed to represent him, and to be that beneath which Cæsar was assassinated, can hardly be presumed genuine; but another also naked, preserved in the Villa Castellazzo near Milan, has a better claim to our confidence. See Winckelmann, Gesch. der Kunst, xi. 1.

² Cic. ad Att. i. 16.: "In comitia omnibus invitatis trudit noster Magnus Auli filium." Plutarch notices the audacious openness with which Pompeius bribed the voters. (Pomp. 44.)

bought, and who understood dancing better than politics.¹ The other, Metellus Celer, had received a personal affront from his patron, who had divorced his sister Mucia immediately upon his return to Rome.² It was under these unfavourable auspices that one of the tribunes, named Flavius, was engaged to bring forward a bill on similar principles to that of Rullus, for a division of lands in Italy among the veterans of Pompeius and the poorer classes of the city. These lands were to consist partly of public domains, partly of estates to be bought by the government with the spoils of the late war. Cicero, who had opposed the former agrarian enactment with so much bitterness, speaks with moderation of this. He professes, in his correspondence, to have bestowed some pains on shaping and amending it, and to have studied to reconcile the interests of the proprietors with those of the state and of Pompeius himself.³ If such was his tone in addressing a private friend, he was probably still more guarded and conciliatory to all parties in the senate. But if the sting was thus taken out of an unpalatable and violent measure, the nobles only relaxed their opposition to fall into indifference and stifle the project by procrastination. The city was occupied, on the one hand, by a topic of private scandal, the intrigue of a noble named Memmius with the wife of a brother of Lucullus.⁴ On the other, it was amused by the manœuvres of Clodius, who, in his anxiety to obtain a seat on the bench of tribunes, was seeking to be adopted into a plebeian family by a vote of the

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 19.; Dion, xxxvii. 49.

² Dion, l.c.; Plut. Pomp. 42. Mucia was the daughter of Mucius Scævola, and half-sister of Celer and Nepos. She was suspected of familiarity with Cæsar.

³ Cic. ad Att. i. 19.: "Et sentinam urbis exhaustur et Italæ solitudinem frequentari posse arbitrabar:" this was the language of the Gracchi.

⁴ Cic. ad Att. i. 18.

people.¹ Every one knew that his ultimate object was to obtain the means of injuring Cicero, and the city looked on with more curiosity than solicitude.

About the same time news arrived from Gaul of the commotions with which that country was menaced, and of the great preparations of the Helvetii for a national emigration, which threatened to respect neither the Roman province nor the territories of the allies. A revolution in Gaul was always a matter of deep alarm at Rome. The senate decreed that the consuls should undertake by lot the defence of the two provinces on either side of the Alps, and that deputies of consular rank should be sent immediately to levy troops and provide for the security of the empire. Distinguished men were promptly selected for this important charge; but Cicero and Pompeius were specially reserved, as statesmen whose services at such a crisis could not be dispensed with at home.² The imminence of this Gallic war cooled down whatever interest the agrarian bill had excited.³ Pompeius, fearing to exasperate the people by pressing his demands at such a moment, desired his friends to desist; but he bitterly regretted the precipitation with which he had disbanded his army and confided himself to the gratitude or fears of his countrymen.⁴ The people, it would seem, were hardly less jealous of their national champion than the senate itself. They conceived that his plan for enriching the rabble of the forum by grants of public land was no better than a cover to his designs upon their liberty.⁵

But is obliged to desist from his demands.

¹ Cic. l. c.

² Such was Cicero's complacent interpretation of this proceeding (ad Att. i. 19.).

³ Cic. l. c. : "Sed hæc tota res interpellata bello refixerat."

⁴ Dion, xxxvii. 50.

⁵ The populace insulted Pompeius in the theatre. An actor having occasion to say in his part, "Nostra miseria tu es magnus," was required to repeat the words several times. At the words, "virtutem

It was a great descent for Pompeius, from giving the word of command to consuls and consuls, to wield, as his instruments, the most turbulent of the tribunes and popular demagogues.¹ To this degradation he was reduced by the hostility of Lucullus and the resentment of Metellus Celer. The consul, for the gratification of his private pique, paid court to Cicero and the senatorial party, and the creature of favour and corruption became all at once, in their eyes, an admirable magistrate, a patriot and a statesman. The violence of his opposition to Pompeius provoked violent retaliation. The tribune Flavius, presuming on his new patron's support, actually seized the consul's person, and threw him into prison. Metellus was well pleased to parade his injuries before the eyes of the city. He summoned the senators to hold their deliberations in his cell. Flavius erected his tribunal before the prison door to prevent their ingress; they caused the wall to be pulled down, and walked into the presence of their chief. Pompeius was not yet hardened to such scandalous proceedings, and hastened to repress his adherents' zeal.² Such moderation, however, would have been a bright spot in the history of these times of selfish violence, had it been accompanied by any attempt to check the degeneracy of the age, and infuse new vigour into the workings of the constitution. But Pompeius had no wish to effect any thing for the good of the state, unless it would surrender itself wholly to his discretion. Then, and not before, he was ready to try the experiment of reform, to bring to bear all the influence he was

His schemes for embroiling public affairs.

istam veniet tempus cum graviter gemes," the audience burst into loud acclamations. Cic. l. c.

¹ Compare Plutarch's remarks, Pomp. 46.

² This story, it must be remarked, rests solely on the authority of Dion (l. c.); and if true, it is strange that it should not be alluded to by Cicero.

known to enjoy, all the wisdom and magnanimity he was supposed at least to possess. It would still remain to be seen what talents the successful warrior really had for civil administration. But no party in the state was yet willing to buy so doubtful a good at so uncertain a price. Meanwhile, the idea began to dawn upon his mind, that by the artful application of his resources, his wealth, his power, his private connexions, he might clog the proceedings of all parties, and throw the executive into a state of abeyance. The dread of mob-rule, and of the violence of demagogues, would ultimately prevail, as nearer and more urgent, over the apprehension of dictatorial despotism; and the author of the confusion would alone be able to disentangle it.

Great as Pompeius undoubtedly was, it was a ^{Weakness of Pompeius.} cardinal defect in his character that he failed to keep his principal aim steadily in view, and allowed minor objects to divert his course and fret away his energies. This may be observed even in his military career, in which his genius was most conspicuous. His operations against Sertorius were desultory and indecisive, and there appear traces of similar feebleness in his contest with Mithridates; his countrymen were dissatisfied, and suspected him of protracting the struggle for political objects. In the city this want of vigour became daily more evident. Accordingly Pompeius failed to acquire any moral ascendency over his associates. His virtues were sobriety and moderation, and these he possessed in an eminent degree. But when these qualities are not the result of resolute self-control, but arise from a deficiency in animation and the sense of enjoyment, they have little attraction for men of warmer temperaments, and exercise still less command over their imaginations. Accordingly, no man was so constantly deceived in the persons he selected for his instruments: they discovered his weaknesses, and shook off the yoke of his condescension. The distance which he affected in his intercourse with those about him arose partly from natural coldness, but more perhaps from his own distrust of his power over them. They mistook it at first for greatness of soul ; but when they approached nearer to the self-proclaimed hero, they found with disgust of what ordinary clay he was formed.

Nor can it be disguised that this coldness and reserve had been known by their usual fruits, in an early career of remorseless cruelty and inveterate dissimulation. The nobles who shuddered at the idea of Pompeius assuming the powers of the dictatorship, well knew the school in which he had been brought up, and the proofs he had given of having imbibed its lessons. He had licked the sword of Sulla ; and as with young tigers who have once tasted blood, they could never be assured that his thirst was sated.¹ He was himself another Marius or Sulla, no better, only more disguised.² Under the orders of the dictator he had shed the best blood of Rome, and had been branded with the title of the young hangman.³ He had put to death a Carbo, a Brutus, a Domitius ; in Spain, under the guise of martial discipline, he had massacred a whole cohort of Roman soldiers : the clemency he had been known to display in later years might be attributed

His dissimulation detected.

¹ Luc. i. 327. :

“ Utque feræ tigres nunquam posuere furorem,
Quas nemore Hyrcano, matrum dum lustra sequuntur,
Altus cæsorum pavit cruor armentorum ;
Sic et Syllanum solito tibi lambere ferrum Durat, Magne, sitis.”

Lucan had no dramatic spirit. This is not what Cæsar might have said, but what his contemporaries did say.

² Tac. Hist. ii. 38. : “ Occultior, non melior.”

³ Val. Max. vi. 2. 8. : “ Adolescentulus carnifex.” Comp. Plut. Pomp. 3. 5. 18. 25.

to lofty scorn, rather than to new-born humanity. His word was not to be trusted, he was capable of disowning his own commands, neither friend nor enemy could rely on his actions corresponding with the sentiments he expressed.¹ Rome might have yielded to a chieftain who demanded her submission with the drawn sword, but it was too much to expect that she should put herself voluntarily in the power of one who affected to ask it as a favour to have the lives and liberties of her children placed in his hands.²

From the moment of his return to the city Pompeius was casting his eyes around him to find creatures who might further his occult ends without either compromising himself or asserting too much independence of his direction. In these intrigues he was singularly unfortunate. When he divorced his wife Mucia, he had perhaps already in view the formation of an advantageous alliance. He proposed, it was said, to connect himself with the family of Cato, with whose character and position he must, if so, have been strangely unacquainted. The overture was rejected with disdain.³ In Cicero, indeed, he found a willing flatterer, and with him he carried on a long course of dissimulation and cajolery, which was transparent to every one except its object.⁴ In vain, exclaimed the great commander to the great

¹ Cic. ad Div. viii. 1. 3.: "Solet aliud sentire, aliud loqui." Comp. ad Att. i. 13. 4., ii. 20. 2., ii. 22. 1., iv. 9., iv. 15. 7.; Sallust, Fragm.: "modestus ad omnia alia nisi ad dominationem." "Oris probi, animo, inverecundo."

² The later Romans drew this distinction between their submission to the usurpers of the civil wars, and to the legalized despotism of the emperors. Lucan, iv. in fin.:

"Jus licet in jugulos nostros sibi fecerit ense
Sylla potens, Mariusque ferox, et Cinna cruentus, Cæsareæque domus series, cui tanta potestas Concessa est."

³ Plut. Pomp. 44.

⁴ It is evident that Cicero was warned against Pompeius by his friend Atticus. Cic. ad Att. i. 17. 10., ii. 1. 6.

orator, *in vain should I have earned the glories of a triumph, hadst not thou preserved the city for me to triumph in.*¹ Indeed, he paid his court to his dupes so assiduously, and showed himself so frequently in his company, that the young nobles gave him jestingly the name of Cnæus Cicero. But he seems to have early satisfied himself that he could make little use of the orator's services. Again, he was disappointed in the behaviour of both the consuls; the one was imbecile, the other unexpectedly hostile; his interests were not advanced by either. Clodius was too giddy and too self-willed to be trusted as an ally; the services of Flavius it was beneath the dignity of the great Pompeius to seem to require. Crassus was aiming like himself at the exasperation of the public dissensions, with the blind presumption that his wealth and the number of his clients would give him the advantage over all competitors in a period of popular discord. But with Crassus he was at deadly feud, for neither were of a temper to forget an ancient jealousy, and Pompeius disdained to make an overture of reconciliation. These circumstances disposed him to invite Cæsar to his counsels; for in Cæsar he had already discovered, as he thought, abundant alacrity to serve him. Such an ally, he conceived, had no consideration to lose in the eyes of the nobility, of whose opinion he stood himself so much in awe; while his temper and necessities seemed equally to encourage him to defy the consequences of the most daring aggressions. We may suppose further, that in the view of a man so decorous and correct as Pompeius, the character of the profligate Marian appeared so bad, that he might expect to be able at any time to shake off and disown the connexion with impunity. The return of Cæsar from his province was opportune for the views of both parties, and they lost no time in coming to the show of a mutual understanding.¹

¹ Cic. de Off. i. 22.

Rome had no rewards for the honourable and beneficial discharge of civil duties in the provinces; but the military successes of the proprætor in Spain entitled him to claim the distinction of a triumph. Cæsar addressed letters to the senate, detailing his exploits and soliciting their reward. But the consulship was an object of more solid advantage; and as the year of Afranius and Celer advanced, the time drew near when it might be sued for and won. One obstacle intervened. The jealousy of the law forbade the Imperator to enter the city before the day of his triumph, while the vanity of the people demanded the appearance in the forum on three stated occasions, of every candidate for their suffrages. It was true that the senate had frequently obtained for its favourites a dispensation from this latter regulation. Marius had been raised to the consulship, Lucullus to the ædileship, each in their absence.² A few years later we shall find Cato himself the foremost to propose a similar indulgence to Pompeius, while holding the proconsulate of Spain, and forbidden accordingly to enter the city.³ But on the present occasion the nobles were rejoiced to throw an impediment in the way of a man they hated; they conceded the triumph to Cæsar on purpose to exclude him from the consulship.⁴ When his friends were urgent to obtain a decree in his favour, the rigid patriot Cato resorted to an artifice, and wore out the day with an interminable harangue.⁵ Doubtless the nobles expected that

¹ It is at this period that the name of Cæsar first occurs in the letters of Cicero, and is introduced to us with the ominous words: “Cæsar cujus nunc venti valde sunt secundi” (ad Att. ii. 1.).

² Plut. Mar. 14., Luc. 1.; Cic. Acad. ii. 1.

³ Plut. Pomp. 54.

⁴ Dion, xliv. 41.

⁵ Suet. Jul. 18.; Dion, xxxvii. 54.

Cæsar sues for the consul-ship, and relinquishes the honour of a triumph.

Cæsar would forego the uncertain contest for the consulship; but on the contrary he relinquished the triumph, and hastily leaving his province before the arrival of his successor, appeared in Rome in due season to solicit the votes of the citizens. To exhibit this preference of their honours before those of the senate was a compliment to the majesty of the people; but in Cæsar's eyes the value of the one outweighed a hundred times the empty glory of the other. He formed a coalition with a wealthy candidate Lucceius¹; the nobles put forth all their strength on behalf of Bibulus, and contributed an immense sum to bribe the centuries. Even Cato joined in this open avowal of corruption, and set his seal to the universal acknowledgment that law was impotent and revolution inevitable.²

Meanwhile, Crassus, set aside equally by the leaders of the various sections of the nobility, the idle, the profligate, and the impracticable, felt himself ill at ease even in his conspicuous position. Cautious, industrious, and studious of appearances, he was himself equally removed from all these extremes; and, without any open rupture, his influence with his party seemed to slip from under him. The return to Rome of Cæsar, the mainspring of every thing original and active, breathed new life into him as well as into Pompeius, and was about to form an era in the fortunes of both. The Marian candidate for the consulship was already prepared to establish an intimate connexion with each, and at the same time to reconcile them to one another. Crassus soon began to listen with satisfaction to the overtures of so skilful a negotiator. A little adroit flattery served to smooth over the wounds his vanity had received;

The cabal of Pompeius,
Cæsar, and Crassus: the first triumvirate.
A.U.694.

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 17. 11.

² Suet. Jul. 19. "Ne Catone quidem abnuente eam largitionem e republica fieri."

and he was easily induced to withdraw his countenance from friends who knew not how to appreciate his importance, and to bestow it upon those who had the prudence to solicit it. Thus did the three competitors for supreme power combine to form a league among themselves for their mutual advancement. They covenanted that no proceedings should be allowed to take place in the commonwealth without the consent of each of the three contracting parties.¹ United they constituted a power beyond all the resources of the commonwealth to cope with. Whether or not they deigned to consult the forms of the constitution, their influence was really omnipotent, their voice decisive. The cabal only wanted open avowal to be recognised as the usurpation of absolute power, and the distribution of this power in more than one hand alone distinguished it from a monarchical despotism. The prodigious alliance of Pompeius, Cæsar, and Crassus, might be branded by statesmen as a Cerberus or Chimæra, the triple monsters of ancient legend; but the popular voice was content to designate it as a triumvirate, merely implying, in political language, an extraordinary public commission.²

The curtain now draws up for the commencement of another act in the great drama, and discloses to us a new development of the history of the Roman people. The blood of the Roman and the Italian has mingled in one common current; the counter-revolution has obliterated all traces of the Sullan reform; the contest has ended in raising individual statesmen to a position in which they can array their own private ambition against the general weal. Each great chieftain finds himself at the head of a faction whose interests centre in him alone, who are ready to fight under his banner and for his personal aggrandizement, and have ceased to invoke the watchwords of party or the principles of class. The triumvirs are now leagued together to undermine the old form of government; by-and-by they will fly asunder, and challenge each other to mortal duel. Each will try to strengthen himself by an appeal to old names and prejudices, and the shadows of a popular and a patrician party will again face each other on the field of Pharsalia; but the real contest will be between a Cæsar and a Pompeius, no longer between the commons and the nobility. For the one party has no common object of sufficient interest to bind it firmly together; the other, though every privilege and every traditional feeling is in peril, has no reliance on its leaders, by whom it has been so often betrayed, and has become a mere gathering of desperate men, crowded together by an instinct of resistance, but animated by no vital principle of permanence or progress.¹

Reflections upon the character of this league.

¹ Suet. Jul. 19.

² Appian, Bell. Civ. ii. 9.: Καὶ τὸς αὐτῶν τὴν δε τὴν συμφροσύνην οὐ γραφεύς, Βάρβων, ἐν βίβλῳ περιλαβὼν, ἐνέγραφε τρικάρανον.

It was precisely at this period, the crisis of the fortunes of the oligarchy, that the best and wisest of its champions became lost to it. Death of Catulus. Catulus died in the same year² which witnessed Cæsar's return to Rome and the establishment of the triumvirate. The confusion into which the affairs of his party from henceforth fell confirms the truth of the mournful panegyrics which Cicero pronounces upon him. *He was a man whom neither the tempests of danger nor the breezes of glory could ever divert from his course either through hope or fear.*³ Since the death of Catulus, he writes in a letter of this period, *I maintain the true policy of my order, without a protector and without a companion.*¹

¹ Vell. ii. 44. "Hoc igitur Cos. inter eum et Cn. Pompeium et M. Crassum inita potentia societas, quæ urbi orbique terrarum, nec minus diverso quoque tempore ipsis, exitiabilis fuit."

² In the middle of the consulship of Metellus Celer. Cic. pro Cæl. 24.

³ Cic. pro Sest. 47.

The effects of this triple union soon became apparent. The election of Cæsar to the con-

Cæsar obtains the consulship for the year 695. B.C. 59. consulship was carried by acclamation; the nobles could only succeed in thrusting in Bibulus as his colleague. This was the second time that these reluctant yoke-fellows had been joined together in public office, and there was little prospect of their bearing their honourable burdens with decent unanimity. In the heat of the rumour of a Gallic tumult the senate had already assigned the two Gauls to the consuls of the year; but the aspect of things became less warlike, and Metellus feared to miss an opportunity for acquiring a triumph.² The senate now hastened to allot their future provinces to the consuls newly designated, and made a feeble attempt to guard against Cæsar's increasing power by decreeing to them the supervision of the roads and forests; a paltry charge, not worthy even of Bibulus.³ Cæsar was justly incensed at this manœuvre, but he had no doubt of being able to counteract it when the time should arrive; meanwhile he had a game to play, and he commenced it with his usual decision.

The consulship was the fulcrum from which the Cæsar as consul proposes an agrarian bill. A.U. 695. whole Roman world was to be moved. Popular measures might secure the favour of the people, and thereby the appointment to some extensive command, the resources of provinces, and the devotion of armies. With these prizes almost within reach, the bold aspirant followed up his successes with increasing ardour. The nobles had recently defeated the agrarian bill of Rullus: Cæsar brought forward a measure substantially the same. He provided lands for the Pompeian veterans, and thus secured the co-operation of Pompeius himself. He also assigned estates to large numbers of the citizens, and proposed to plant 20,000 colonists in the public domain in Campania.¹ Commissioners were to be appointed to execute the division of lands, and the patronage of these lucrative and influential appointments remained in the hands of the consul himself. The people hailed the announcement of this popular measure with acclamations; but it was requisite to obtain the sanction of the senate, before the consul could offer it to the centuries. The nobles felt the danger of rejecting or mutilating it. Cicero hesitated to renew the combat in the face of both Crassus and Pompeius: but his party saw the fatal influence Cæsar would gain by it, and put forward Cato, not to contest or cavil at the bill itself, but simply to protest against all innovation. The consul ventured to treat this manœuvre as an illegitimate artifice. He ordered his lictors to seize his antagonist, as it were for contempt, and carry him off to prison. The fathers rose in consternation: many followed their fellow-senator to the place of confinement. Petreius, a blunt soldier, vowed that chains with Cato were better than the presence of the oppressor Cæsar. The consul, it is said, was moved to shame: he caused Cato to be set free, and at the same time dismissed the assembly, with the declaration that it was illegal to refuse to entertain a measure moved by the chief magistrate, and with a threat that henceforth he would dispense with the senatorial decree altogether, and bring his projects of law at once before the people.

¹ Cic. ad Att. i. 20. Asinius Pollio commenced his history of the civil wars with the consulship of Afranius and Metellus: "Motum ex Metello consule civicum." Hor. Od. ii. 1.

² Cic. ad Att. i. 20.

³ Suet. Jul. 19.: "Provinciæ minimi negotii." It is possible, however, that this charge was not quite so trivial. Cælius writes to Cicero, in the year 704, that Curio was about to propose a law in the interest of Cæsar, "viariam, non dissimilem agrariæ Rulli," and combines it with a lax alimentaria. (Cic. ad Div. viii. 6.) Any measure which threw the public burdens on the privileged classes would be agreeable to Cæsar

¹ Vell. ii. 44.; comp. the various statements of Dion, xxxviii. 1, Appian, B.C. ii. 10.

Such a mode of proceeding would doubtless have been utterly irregular: nevertheless the Hortensian law, which made a resolution of the tribes, moved by a tribune, binding upon the whole body of the citizens, had shown that enactments could be passed without the concurrent action of the senate. Cæsar, however, did not yet despair of influencing the nobles in their own assembly. He assured the citizens that the measure would be granted them if they could succeed in persuading his colleague Bibulus. During my year, exclaimed Bibulus, you shall not obtain your desire, not though you cried for it with one voice. Cæsar proceeded to ask the opinions of Pompeius and Crassus, which, as he knew, were favourable, and their votes swayed the decision of many others. Thus thwarted and harassed, Bibulus engaged certain of the tribunes to obstruct the proceedings before the people; and when this resource failed, he pretended to consult the auspices, and declared all the remainder of the year to be holy-time. Law, usage, and superstition combined to forbid the transaction of public affairs at such a season: it was an act of supreme audacity in the consul to defy this impediment, however manifestly factitious; but the passions and interests of the people proved stronger than their principles or prejudices, and a day was appointed for moving the bill in the comitia. The citizens filled the forum before dawn to prevent it being occupied by the dependents of their adversaries; nevertheless respect or fear induced them to make way for Bibulus, who boldly sought to confront Cæsar himself in the porch of the temple of Castor and Pollux, whence he was about to declaim. But when he ventured

His violent contest with
the nobles.

to speak in opposition he was thrust down the steps, his fasces broken, and himself and his attendants bruised and wounded. The law was carried through. The next day Bibulus attempted to obtain a decree against it in the senate; but the senators themselves were now disposed to submit to the insult. It only remained for him to shut himself up in his own house, send his officers to protest, in the name of the Gods, against every public act of his colleague, and consult at home with a cabal of his own adherents on the interests of his country or his party.

The law had indeed been carried through with a high hand. In vain had Bibulus bared his throat to the populace, and deprecated their violence by exposing himself most freely to it. Even Lucullus, old and feeble as he was, suffered personal maltreatment, and only saved his life, it was said, by casting himself at Cæsar's feet. Cato, whose spirits rose with danger, had exerted himself with impetuous energy. He pushed his way to the rostrum, but his sonorous voice was drowned in the uproar, and he was dragged from the spot by Cæsar's orders. When the law was passed both he and Celer refused to swear obedience to it. A second law, declaring refusal capital, at last compelled them to submit. Pompeius looked on with secret satisfaction: the acts of his provincial command were now obsequiously ratified; and he attributed this consummation to the craftiness of his own intrigues, and to the master-stroke by which he had enlisted Cæsar in league with himself and Crassus.¹

Much of the violence and apparent bitterness of the statesmen of the day which we have witnessed hitherto may be attributed to the excitability of the Italian character, prone to the most exaggerated expression of its feelings. The politicians of Rome continued notwithstanding to converse in private with much harmony and good temper: their public feuds were often forgotten in the relaxation of social intercourse. Their conduct was rather that of rival gamesters than of deadly enemies. But at this crisis an event occurred which served to sow dark suspicions among honourable opponents, and reminded men once more of the use of the dagger, not unfamiliar to them in a ruder age of the republic. Vettius, whose name has already received dishonourable mention, either attempted, or pretended that he had been suborned to attempt, the lives of Cæsar and Pompeius.¹ He was arrested with a poniard upon his person, which he declared had been furnished him for the deed by the consul Bibulus. His disclosures tended to implicate the most conspicuous members of the senatorial party, Cato and Cicero, and more especially the younger Curio. The nobles on their part insinuated that the pretended plot was a fabrication of Cæsar himself. Vettius, they asserted, had promised Cæsar to break down Curio's rising influence by fastening upon him a charge which should cover him with odium and disgrace. With this view he had wormed himself into the young man's confidence, and gradually prepared him for the announcement of his intended blow. Curio escaped the snare, and revealed the plot to his father, the father to Pompeius. Such was the version of the story put forth by the nobles. To this there was nothing to be opposed but Vettius's word, upon which no party deigned to rely. The criminal was thrown into prison, and was found some days afterwards dead in his bed. His death was attributed to suicide, but the rumour prevailed that he had been despatched for the convenience of others. Many persons may have wished his death. At every fresh examination he had denounced new names: the noble Lucullus was implicated in his reckless disclosures no less than a Domitius, a Lentulus, a Piso and a Brutus. The discoverer or fabricator of the plot was a tribune in the interest of Cæsar, named Vatinius. At a later period it was upon this man that Cicero ventured to fasten the crime of murder. Cæsar at this time had placed Cicero under obligations, otherwise he would not perhaps have scrupled to designate the consul himself as the midnight assassin. But the orator himself, according to other accounts, incurred a similar suspicion¹, and in such a maze of conflicting testimony we can only drop the veil again upon the corpse of the victim.

The bill is forced upon the Senate.

Mysterious confession of a conspiracy against the lives of Cæsar and Pompeius.

¹ Compare Dion, xxxviii. 1—7.; Appian, B.C. ii. 12.; Suet. Jul. 20.

¹ This story is given in detail by Cicero (ad Att. ii. 24.). Compare Suet. Jul. 20.; Plut. Luc. 42., and Cic. in Vat. 11.; also the Schol. Bobiana pro Sest. p. 308., in Vatin. 320. These writers agree in insinuating that the plot was a fabrication of Cæsar's. Appian (B.C. ii. 12.) suggests an unsatisfactory reason on the other side. Comp. Dion, xxxviii. 9.

Bibulus did not venture forth again in public during the remainder of his term of office. Cæsar continued to administer the affairs of the commonwealth without the aid or opposition of his colleague.² The release of the knights from the rigour of the terms on which they farmed the revenues of Asia was another of his measures³; a wise one in itself, and at the same time conducive to his own interests; for that body, already alienated from the senate by the repulse they had before suffered, and apparently cooling in their gratitude towards Cicero, their un-

Cæsar obtains
the proconsul-ship of the two Gauls and Illyricum for five years.

¹ Dion, l. c.

² Suet. Jul. 20.: "Ut nonnulli urbanorum quum quid per jocum testandi gratia signarent, non Cæsare et Bibulo, sed Julio et Cæsare consulibus, actum scriberent . . . utque vulgo ferrentur hi versus:

"Non Bibulo quicquam nupcr, sed Cæsare factum est:

Nam Bibulo fieri consule nil memini."—Comp. Dion, xxxviii. 8.

³ Suet. l. c.; Appian, B.C. ii. 13.; Dion, l. c.

successful patron, were delighted to transfer their allegiance to the popular champion. The increased influence which the consul acquired by these proceedings he took care to confirm and extend by a great display of munificence in his shows and entertainments.¹ The alarm with respect to Gaul had in some measure subsided during this year; but the people, on the motion of Vatinius, conferred upon their favourite the charge of the Cisalpine province, together with that of Illyricum, for the space of five years; an extraordinary stretch of their prerogative, but one for which the Manilian and Gabinian laws afforded ample precedents. Both Crassus and Pompeius blindly supported the interests of their colleague, and in addition extorted for him from the senate the Transalpine province, the seat of expected war.² But the nobles were glad perhaps to rid themselves of his presence upon any terms; while he sought the conduct of extensive and protracted military operations, with the view of creating an army of devoted adherents, and enriching a numerous retinue of the best families in Rome. At the same time Pompeius offered his hand to Julia, his confederate's daughter³, and this alliance was regarded as a pledge of their fidelity to each other in their scheme of common advancement. In vain did Cato warn the senate that it had exalted a king over itself, and introduced him, guards and all, into the citadel of the commonwealth. Even Cæsar himself seems for once to have been intoxicated with success, and to have vaunted in unmeasured language the triumph he had achieved over his enemies, and the vengeance he would wreak upon them.¹

¹ One of Cæsar's popular acts, of more than ordinary sagacity, was his providing for the publication of the proceedings of the senate. Suet. Jul. 20.; Duruy, Hist. des Romains, ii. 399.

² The one province was probably at this time a necessary complement to the other. Cæsar constantly levied in the Cisalpine Gaul the troops which he required for his campaigns in the remoter province. Dion, xxxviii. 8.

³ Vell. ii. 44.; Dion, lib. xxxviii. 9.; Suet. Jul. 21. Cæsar gave his daughter to Pompeius, though she was betrothed at the time to another. He at the same time married Calpurnia, the daughter of I. Calpurnius Piso.

The affairs, however, of the city were at this moment assuming a character of more intense interest than ever. After vacating the consulship at the commencement of the year 696, and taking the command of his legions, Cæsar still continued to linger outside the walls to watch events. The new consuls were A. Gabinius and L. Calpurnius Piso, both adherents of the triumvirs, the one devoted to Pompeius, the other to Cæsar, who had just espoused his daughter. They seem both to have been equally notorious as men of depraved characters and dangerous dispositions, though Piso displayed an almost cynical affectation of republican virtue.² Clodius sought the tribuneship, and Cæsar, who counted on his services, had exerted himself to effect his required adoption into a plebeian house. The forms of the law were satisfied or evaded³, and, to the dismay of the nobles, the shameless intriguer was elected to the office he coveted. While his immediate object was well known to be the persecution of Cicero, his personal enemy, he was generally regarded as a creature of Pompeius, and feared as a ready instrument for the furtherance of his treacherous schemes. The consuls were necessitous and greedy, and the young tribune made no scruple to assure them, on

A. U. 696.
B. C. 58.
Clodius elected tribune · his popular measures.

¹ Plut. Cat. Min. 33., Pomp. 48.; Suet. Jul. 22.

² Comp. Cic. Or Post Red. 4., pro Dom. 9.. pro Sest. 7., de Prov. Cons. 3., in Pison. 4. But it must be borne in mind that our knowledge of them, especially of Piso, is derived principally from their enemy, and that he at an earlier time had spoken more favourably of both (ad Qu. Fr. i. 2.).

³ Cic. ad Att. ii. 12.; Vell. ii. 45.; Suet. Jul. 20.; Dion, xxxviii. 12, Cicero advanced various technical objections to the legality of this adoption (pro Dom. 13. 29.).

the strength of the favour in which the people held him, of the reversion of two lucrative provinces at the expiration of their year.¹ With such a combination of influential men to back him, Clodius put forth without delay a series of measures, calculated both to increase his own popularity and to cripple the vital powers of the oligarchy. He began with proposing a gratuitous distribution of corn to the needy citizens.² He introduced a bill to limit the power of the censors in expelling unworthy members from the senatorial body.³ He also effected the restoration of the colleges, or guilds of trades, which had been suppressed only a few years before by a decree of the senate. These guilds dated their origin from the time of Numa⁴, and the institution, doubtless, in the first instance, was wise and salutary. They were calculated, at the era of their foundation and long after, to raise the estimation of the kinds of labour which they fostered and protected; a matter of importance in a city of soldiers and landholders, among whom the artisan and the dealer were generally held in contempt.⁵ At a much later period these guilds gave weight and consistency to the class next below that of the knights and publicani, one which, without the enjoyment of public office or dignity, had nevertheless a stake in the commonwealth and

¹ Cic. de Prov. Cons. 2.: "Syria et Macedonia quas, vobis invitis et oppressis pestiferi illi consules pro eversæ reipublicæ præmiis occupaverunt."

² Lex Clodia frumentaria. Ascon. in Pison. p. 9.

³ Lex Clodia de censoria notione. Ascon in Pison. l. c.: "Quartam (legem tulit Clodius) ne quem censores in legendō senatu præterirent neve qua ignominia afficerent, nisi qui apud eos accusatus et utriusque censoris sententia damnatus esset." Dion, xxxviii. 13.; comp. Cic. pro Sest. 25. This law was again abolished by Scipio in his consulship, A. U. 702.

⁴ Plut. Num. 31. Many of these guilds are specified by Plutarch, Num. 27., and Pliny, H.N. xxxiv. 1., xxxv. 46.; comp. Dionys. Hal. Ant. Rom. iv. 43. See various inscriptions in the collections.

⁵ Cic. de Off. i. 42.

an interest in its well-being. Their direct tendency to consolidate the power of the middle ranks of society made them extremely obnoxious to the higher aristocracy, which had only recently effected their suppression.¹ At the same time it must be allowed that in a period of faction and licence, and the occasional ascendancy of mere mob-government, they were liable to be perverted to the worst purposes, and to become nurseries of sedition. In the existing condition of the city, the familiar use of private bonds of union, secret signs and devices, and peculiar social distinctions, all tended to foster the spirit of lawless combination which menaced the commonwealth with ruin. On the other hand, the persons, the property and the repute of the trading classes had no further need for special protection; the growth of luxury and refinement rendered their services indispensable, and ensured them respect. Accordingly Cicero opposed the restoration of the colleges, and we shall find hereafter how carefully the wisest rulers watched and restrained them. But Clodius undoubtedly was looking to the further use to which an unscrupulous demagogue might mould them, and he succeeded in carrying his measure triumphantly.²

A still more important step was the repeal of the Ælian and Fufian laws, which had become practically one of the most efficient weapons of the oligarchy in the deadly struggles in which it was engaged.³ These

Repeal of the Lex Ælia
Fufia.

¹ “L. Cæcilio, Q. Marcio consulibus, collegia sublata sunt quæad. versus rempublicam videbantur esse.” Ascon. in Pison. § 8.

² Lex Clodia de collegiis. Ascon. in Pison. l. c.: “Post novem annos quam sublata erant, P. Clodius trib. pl. lege lata restituit collegia.” Comp. Dion, xxxviii. 13.

³ Lex Clodia de auspiciis. Cic. pro Cest. 15.; Ascon. l. c.; Dion, l. c. We do not know what were the actual provisions of the new law, but we can hardly suppose that they went the whole length of repealing the consular prerogative in a matter so closely connected with the popular superstitions. A few years after this we find the statutes directed that, whenever the comitia were convened, the consuls should consult the auspices and signs of the heavens according to the prescribed forms; if they declared them to be unfavourable, the assembly was to be at once dissolved, and its acts rendered invalid. This became a constitutional check in the hands of the consuls to the power of the tribunes¹, who, among their other prerogatives, possessed the right of summoning the popular assemblies. Thus, when Bibulus had refused to attend the comitia, he had performed these ceremonies, as he asserted, in his own house, and had denounced the proceedings of the people as obnoxious to the Gods. The act by which Clodius had obtained his adoption into the plebs had been vitiated in a similar manner; and at a later period, Cicero could argue upon this ground that his enemy's election to the tribunate had, from the first, been null and void, and all his subsequent acts illegal. To overthrow this bulwark of the existing order of things was naturally a great object with Clodius himself and his party, however manifest it might be that the power of the people had outgrown the danger to which it was in earlier times exposed from it. But having cleared his way by all these preliminary movements, the tribune next proceeded to make his meditated attack upon the destroyer of Catilina's associates.

We have already seen how rapidly Cicero fell in general estimation and influence after the eventful period of his consulship. As he felt himself sinking, he strove to buoy him-

Danger of Cicero's position.

consuls still obnouncing, as it was called, and thus vitiating the proceedings of the comitia, as heretofore. It may be urged, however, that, after the defeat of Clodius, the laws passed in his tribunate would be little regarded by the opposite party. Yet Cicero speaks of the Lex Aelia Fufia as entirely abolished (in Vatin. 8, 9.).

¹ The tribunes had also the power of taking the auspices, and were accustomed to thwart the proceedings of their colleagues by these means. Cic. in Vatin. 8.

self up by constantly dinging into the ears of senate and people the glories of his administration, and magnifying his own deeds with all the rhetorical extravagance, which might be excusable, if not always graceful, in his pleadings for others.¹ The virulence of the great contending factions had thrown both equally beyond the reach of his moderate counsels, and the superior lustre of the triumvirs had cast his services and abilities entirely into the shade. The three allies had no occasion to encumber themselves with a fourth colleague for the sake of talents with which they could dispense; and it is but justice to the great orator to say that he was too sincere a patriot to devote himself to such an association. But at the same time, the suspicion which haunted him, that he was in constant danger of being seduced by their intrigues, was altogether unfounded. Difficult as it is to read the real designs and objects of the crafty confederates under the disguises which they all knew how to assume, it seems to have been their aim to inflict a wound upon the oligarchy through the sides of their vaunted consul.² Pompeius at least contemplated, as we may conjecture, that the sympathy of his order and of his personal friends would raise a tumult in Cicero's defence, and looked steadily for the moment when an armed interference would be requisite to restore peace to the republic, and elevate one of the cabal to an avowed and legalized supremacy.

¹ Plut. Cic. 24.: Οὕτε γὰρ βουλὴν, οὕτε δῆμον, οὕτε δικαστήριον ἦν συνελθεῖν, ἐν φυλῇ Κατιλίναν ἔδει θρυλλούμενον ἀκοῦσαι καὶ Λέντυλον. The reader will be pleased with the good-humoured apology which the biographer makes for his hero.

² Vell. ii. 45.: “Non carueunt suspicione oppressi Ciceronis Cæsar et Pompeius.” Cicero allows (pro Sest. 7.) that Pompeius had given him an assurance that he would require a solemn promise from Clodius not to molest him; but it is evident that he had no faith in the triumvir's sincerity.

Cæsar makes friendly overtures, which he rejects.

Cæsar, indeed, with his natural kindness and friendly feeling¹, would have spared Cicero the humiliation of a public disgrace. He offered him a place in the list of commissioners for dividing the Campanian lands²; a post of honour, inasmuch as it was coveted for lucre's sake by the greatest personages, and still more one of influence, in which he might have surrounded himself with a host of friends and expectants. When Cicero refused this offer, Cæsar pressed him to become one of his lieutenants in Gaul, which would at least have removed him from the scene of the machinations in progress against him.³ But the orator seems to have considered this appointment beneath his dignity, and he would not consent to be withdrawn from the sphere in which he conceived his political importance to lie. He persisted also in his fond hope that the Roman people would not desert him in extremity⁴; that his enemy's schemes would eventually be frustrated; that Pompeius would step in at the last moment for his protection. It was not till he found every solicitation rejected with increasing marks of distrust, that Cæsar seems to have determined to abandon to his fate the inveterate opponent of his policy. As he saw the crisis approach, he hovered about the city with the troops he had collected, and was evidently in a better position than either of his colleagues for seizing the dictatorship, if, in the midst of these impending convulsions the state should lose its balance.

¹ Dion, xxxviii. 11. ἐπιεικεστέραν μὲν γὰρ ὅντως εἰλήχει φύσιν, καὶ οὐ πάνυ ῥαδίως ἔθυμοῦτο θυμῷ μὲν δὴ οὐδὲν ἔχαρίζετο, κ. τ. λ.

² Vell. I. c.: "Hoc sibi contraxisse videbatur Cicero quod inter xx viros dividendo agro Campano esse noluisset." Comp. Cic. ad Att. ix. 2.; Quintil. xii. 1. 16. It appears from a letter to Atticus (ii. 5.), that the orator was expecting the offer of a mission to Egypt, of which he speaks with much affected coyness. It does not appear whether the offer was ever made, but probably not.

³ Cic. ad Att. ii. 18.

⁴ Dion, xxxviii. 16.: Τούτοις οὖν τοῖς λογισμοῖς κρατήσειν ἐλπίσας, καὶ γὰρ ἔθάρσει παρὰ λόγον ὥσπερ ἀνεξετάστως ἔδειει.

Meanwhile Pompeius, who was jealous of any union between Cæsar and Cicero, remarked this distrust with satisfaction. From old habits of respect and awe, the orator continued still to regard him as alone possessed of power to restrain the popular demagogue ; and Pompeius did not hesitate to lure him on to the last with false hopes, to prevent his throwing himself into the arms of another. From Crassus, with whom he was on terms of personal enmity¹, Cicero had no aid to expect, and, notwithstanding every soothing assurance on the part of Pompeius, he could not but observe with increasing terror his enemy's plans unfold themselves. By giving way, however, to these apprehensions he only animated the courage of his enemies, and confirmed the coldness or secret treachery of those who professed to protect him. He hastily determined to hazard an appeal to the compassion of his countrymen, whom he had saved from revolution, or at least of the party whose ascendency he had preserved. Accordingly, he suddenly appeared in public in black garments, as a suppliant for favour and commiseration², a theatrical display never adopted except by persons actually under accusation. This stroke of policy was not unsuccessful among the orator's friends, but it made no impression upon the hostile or indifferent. The senate indeed clothed itself in mourning, and vast numbers of the knights and other classes followed its example. Even Publius Crassus, the triumvir's son, a devoted admirer of Cicero as a statesman and philosopher, assumed the costume of fear and sorrow in which no fewer than twenty thousand of the citizens arrayed themselves.³ But Clodius and his agents were unabashed ; their confi-

Cicero appeals to the compassion of the people :

¹ Plut. Crass. 13.

² Plut. Cic. 30.

³ Cic. Or. post Red. ad Quir. 3., pro Sest. 11, 12., and elsewhere. Dion, xxxviii. 16. The consuls issued an edict to forbid this token of sympathy.

dence even rose on beholding the effect the mere rumour of their leader's machinations had created. They made a jest of the mourners, raised tumults in the streets, and assailed both Cicero and his adherents with mud and stones.¹

The friends of the orator, more terrified and perplexed than ever, now made a last effort to secure the protection, or at least ascertain the intentions of the consuls and triumvirs. They deemed it impossible that any men who aspired to hold the reins of government should continue to countenance the violence of a faction which had taken possession of the streets. But Gabinius treated their representations with scorn.² Piso, to whom, as a family-connexion, Cicero applied in person, though less rude, proved not more tractable.³ He affected to treat the suppliant consular with frankness. He explained to him that Gabinius was compelled by his poverty, if not by his inclination, to espouse the popular side, and that since he despaired of obtaining anything from the senate, his hopes of succeeding to a rich province depended upon the favour of the tribunes. It was his own duty, he argued, to advance the interests of his colleague, just as Cicero himself had catered for Antonius; irony the more cutting, since it was rumoured, falsely we may believe, that, in conceding to Antonius the government of Macedonia, the orator had stipulated for a share of its expected profits. In conclusion he coldly took leave of his visitor, recommending him, as the common duty of every citizen, to provide for his own interests and safety.¹ At the same time the heads of the senatorial party, with a crowd of citizens in their train, betook themselves to the house of Pompeius at Alba, whither he had retired to avoid the solicitations he foresaw, and which he feared perhaps his inability to parry. The Clodians, indeed, had plied him with secret admonitions to protect himself against the dagger of the friend he was betraying, and then gave out that his retirement was adopted for personal security.² Pompeius replied to his visitors, by referring them to the consuls, the appointed guardians of the public peace and of private rights: if they thought fit to summon him to arm in their defence, he was ready, he said, to obey the call.³ To Cicero himself, who even after this repulse ventured to apply to him in person, he declared more explicitly, that against the will of Cæsar he could do nothing; and herein we may believe that he threw off for once his usual dissimulation, and confessed the truth, that the whole affair was really hurried irresistibly along by the impulse which Cæsar had given it.

¹ Plut. Cic. l. c.; Dion, l. c.; Cic. pro Mil. 14.

² Cic. pro Sest. 11.

³ Dion (l. c.) thinks that he was not personally hostile to Cicero, and gave him the advice which he really deemed the most expedient under the circumstances.

Clodius had already established his popularity when he brought forward the bill to which all his previous efforts were intended to pave the way. He proposed that the assembled people should declare, in general terms, that every man guilty of a citizen's blood, without legal sanction, should be put under the ban of the state and interdicted from fire and water. This was, in fact, a sentence of Clodius prevails on the people to pass a resolution affecting Cicero's safety; who retires into voluntary exile.

¹ Cic. in Pis. 6. This account rests upon Cicero's own representation of the affair, but there seems no reason to doubt its correctness in the main. But we may disregard the coarse personalities which the orator flings against his enemies, the effeminacy he ascribes to the perfumed Gabinius, and the crapulousness of his sententious colleague.

² Cic. pro Sest. 18., pro Dom. 11.

³ Cic. in Pison. 31.

outlawry, by which the person so attainted was denied legal protection, his property was confiscated, to harbour him was rendered penal, and any one was allowed to slay him with impunity. Such a resolution would be, at first sight, no more than a confirmation of laws already existing ; but it would bind the people to enforce their dormant severity, and it would point directly at Cicero, who, by putting Lentulus to death by authority of the senate, had overstepped the popular limitation of its prerogatives.¹ The tribune convened the people in the Flaminian Circus, outside the walls, to give Cæsar an opportunity of attending their deliberations, for, being invested with a military command, he could not enter the city. Thus invited, he took part in the discussion, reminding the assembly of the opinion he had expressed against the capital sentence, and he reiterated his condemnation, both on legal and political grounds, of the conduct of the consul and his party : at the same time, he faintly dissuaded the adoption of the present proposal, on the ground that the time for animadversion was past, and that it was better to bury the whole matter in oblivion. But the tribes affirmed the resolution, and Clodius was determined not to reject the weapons they put into his hands. Cicero's wisest course, as many then thought, and himself also at a later period, would have been to take no notice of this menace, which did not expressly accuse him, and thus to defy the enemy to attack him directly.² To accept this resolution as affecting himself was to acknowledge himself conscious at least of an irregularity, which both the senate and their champion indignantly denied. Some advised, and among them was old Lucullus, to draw the sword at once, not in defence of Cicero only, but of the senate, of the legislation of Sulla, of the interests of the best and worthiest classes of the nation.¹ There was no safety, they argued, in parleying any longer with the popular demagogues: every year was adding to their strength; their leaders clung closer together instead of splitting asunder; the opposite party had already fallen into the hands of three chiefs with a common object; if it came under the power of one, its unity of purpose and action would be irresistible. But others persuaded Cicero to bow to the present storm, which they felt assured could be only transient.² The popularity of so miserable a creature as Clodius could not last; better counsels must ultimately prevail in the breast of statesmen so respectable as Pompeius, at least, and Crassus. If he left Rome for the present, the matter might be more easily smoothed over, the sentence modified, and perhaps shortly reversed.³ Cicero yielded to this advice with the general prudence and humanity of his disposition⁴; but he has marred the grace of the concession, in the judgment of posterity, by the unmanly lamentations with which he accompanied it. The last act of the retiring patriot was to take an image of Minerva, which he prized among his household treasures, and place it in the temple of the Capitoline Jupiter⁵; signifying thereby that the citizen,

¹ See Cicero's speeches after his return from exile, and his letters to Atticus. Dion, xxxviii. 17.; Plut. Cic. 30. 31.

² Cic. ad Att. iii. 15. : "Cæci, cæci, inquam, fuimus, &c. . . . quod, nisi nominatim mecum agi cœptum fuerit, perniciosum fuit."

¹ Lucullus recommended Cicero to remain in the city and defy the malice of his enemies. (Plut. Cic. 31.) He must assuredly have contemplated bringing matters to a crisis by a resort to arms.

² Hortensius and even Cato were of this opinion. Plut. Cat. Min. 35.; Dion, xxxviii. 17.

³ The laws allowed a Roman citizen to escape capital punishment by voluntary exile; but in such case they permitted the confiscation of his property, and inflicted upon him civil incapacity to the fullest extent.

⁴ His views are expressed with eloquence and sense in the speech Pro Sest. 19—21.

⁵ Plut. Cic. 31.; Dion, l. c.; Cic. de Legg. ii. 17.

who had once saved his country by his presence, recommended its preservation during his enforced absence to the Goddess of moderation and wisdom.¹

¹ Middleton, Life of Cicero. A better interpretation perhaps would be, that in time of anarchy wisdom must seek refuge under the protection of power.

CHAPTER V.

Early conquests of the Gauls: their formidable hostility to Rome.—Gradual success of the Romans in the Contest between them.—Reduction of Gallia Cisalpina.—Alliance of Rome with Massilia.—The Romans acquire a province beyond the Alps.—Gaulish Ethnology:—1. The Iberians: 2. The Gael: 3. The Belgæ.—Discrepancy between Cæsar and Strabo: Modern theory of a Distinction between the Kymry and Gael in Gaul as well as Britain.—Physical and moral Characteristics; Civilization; Religion: 4. The German tribes in Gaul.—General character of the Gauls, and amount of their Population.

Of all the nations with which Rome had come into collision, two alone could boast of having reduced her to submission: the Etruscans had extorted hostages at her gates; the Gauls had encamped within her walls, and carried off the ransom of her existence.¹ The surrender of the city to Porsena, attested by the most veracious of her historians, had spread an expiring gleam over the annals of the Etruscan nation, already declining from its highest power, and doomed to speedy decay and entire subjugation. The victorious attack of Brennus, in the fourth century of her career, marks the era at which the tide of Gaulish conquest was its full. About that period the name of the Gauls was more terrible, throughout Europe and western Asia, than that of any other conquerors. They had occupied almost every part of Spain, and might still be traced in the remotest corners of the Victorious career of the Gauls in Europe and Asia.

¹ Tac. Ann. xi. 24.: “Capti a Gallis sumus, sed et Tuscis obsides dedimus.” Pliny (Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 39.) states that the treaty which Porsena concluded with the Romans forbade them the use of iron except for implements of husbandry.

Peninsula.¹ The indigenous Iberians had been compelled either to amalgamate with them, or to make their escape through the passes of the Pyrenees. In a series of repeated immigrations, they had succeeded in establishing themselves throughout the north of Italy, overthrowing the languid power of the Etruscans in that region, and re-peopling its half-deserted cities with colonists of a new race. From the central recesses of the parent country vast swarms were still incessantly issuing. One horde established a Gallic sovereignty on the banks of the Danube. A second penetrated into Illyria, and prepared the way for the successive waves which spread over Pæonia and Macedonia, which broke against the defiles of Thermopylæ, and were at last shivered to atoms in the gorges of Delphi. Another band, still more adventurous, succeeded in crossing the Thracian Bosporus, and made itself master of the greater part of Asia Minor. The populous coasts of the Ægean Sea, with all the fair cities of Ionia, were overrun by these barbarians in the third century before our era; and, after many vicissitudes of fortune in their wars against the kings of Syria, they still left their name impressed upon a province of Asia, and became, as mercenary troops, the main defence of the thrones of their conquerors.²

However much the Romans might strive to disguise the full extent of their disgrace, the taking of the city by the Gauls left a deep and permanent impression upon their minds. War with the Gauls was thenceforth regarded with peculiar alarm and horror. It

Their capture of the city leaves a deep impression on the minds of
the Romans.

¹ The Gallæci or Callaici, in Gallicia, and the Celtici near the mouth of the Guadiana, were of Gaulish descent.

² Justin, xxv. 2. See Amedée Thierry's Histoire des Gaulois, partie 1. ch. i. iv. x. I shall have frequent occasion to refer to this admirable work, as also to the same writer's Histoire de la Gaule sous l'Administration Romaine. The one I shall cite under the title "Gaulois," the other under that of "Gaule."

was designated, not by the ordinary term of War, but as a Tumult; an era of dismay and confusion, when the customary regulations of the state must be suspended, and the usual immunities from service overruled.¹ The defeat of the Allia continued to be commemorated in the calendar as an anniversary of evil omen²; and a special hoard of treasure was deposited in the Capitol, never to be touched except for the purpose of repelling a Gallic invasion.³ The strength and stature of the barbarians, so much exceeding those of the Italian races, made it necessary for the Roman generals to improve the equipment of the legionaries. Camillus introduced the helmet of brass or iron, and fortified the shield with a rim of metal, to turn the edge of the heavy but untempered Gaulish sword; he furnished his soldiers also with a long spike, to keep the gigantic enemy at a distance.⁴

For a while the Gauls passed annually under the walls of Rome, in quest of booty from Latium or Campania. At last the Romans took courage, and ventured to issue from their retreat and obstruct the march of the Continuation of the struggle between the Romans and Gauls. predators. The tactics of the generals of the republic were signalized by caution no less than by bravery, and the result of more than one well-fought campaign was the final deliverance of central Italy from these periodical ravages. The popular stories by which the events of this conflict were embellished, of the golden collar won by Manlius, and of the

¹ Plut. Cam. 41.: Οὗτω δ' οὖν δ φένος ήν Ισχυρὸς, ὃστε θέσθαι νόμον ἀφεῖσθαι τοὺς ἱερεῖς στρατείας χωρὶς ἀν μὴ Γαλατικὸς ἢ πόλεμος. Comp. Appian, B.C. ii. 150.

² Luc. vii. 409.: "Et damnata diu Romanis Allia fastis." Comp. Ovid, A.A. i. 413., and elsewhere.

³ App. B.C. ii. 41.: "Α φασιν ἐπὶ Κελτοῖς πάλαι σὺν ἀρά δημοσίᾳ τεθῆναι. κ. τ. λ.

⁴ Plut. Cam. 40.; Polyæn. Strat. viii. 7. These pikes (ὅσσοι μακροί) were probably massive and heavy, and not adapted for throwing. The famous pilum was a modification of this pike, shortened to six feet, and used principally as a missile. (Gaulois, I. iii.)

raven which aided Valerius in his unequal combat, evince the long-continued interest with which the Romans regarded this desperate struggle.¹

The next contest which took place between the two nations was decided at a greater distance from the hearths of the republic. In the year of the city 455, a new swarm of barbarians issued from the defiles of the Alps, and threatened to overthrow the earlier establishments of their own countrymen within that barrier. The Cisalpine Gauls diverted them from this unnatural enterprize by pointing to the riches of the south, and opening to them a passage to the frontiers of Etruria. Some of the elder migration also offered to accompany the new comers.² The Etruscans were engaged at the moment in the secret preparation of a mighty armament against Rome. Alarmed and disconcerted at the arrival of the strangers, demanding lands as the price of peace, they sought to enlist them on their own side by the amplest promises of Roman plunder. Meanwhile they offered an immediate do-native in money. The price was stipulated and paid down, when the Gauls treacherously refused to move without the more substantial present of a fixed territorial settlement. Give us lands, they exclaimed, and we will be your allies now and hereafter; otherwise we will retrace our steps with the treasures we have already extorted. Deceived and baffled, the Etruscans deliberated, and determined, with becoming spirit, to have no further dealings with such perfidious and dangerous allies. The Gauls kept their word, and recrossed the Apennines; but discord soon arose between the Transalpine and Cisalpine divisions of their army, and the greater part of both perished together in the furious encounters which resulted from their disputes.

Fresh immigration of Gauls into Italy, A. u. 455.

¹ Sall. B.J. 114.: "Cum Gallis pro salute non pro gloria certare."

² Liv. x. 10.: Polyb. ii. 19.

At this period, however, the ramifications of a great Italian coalition were extending themselves throughout the Peninsula. The Samnites and Umbrians united with the Etruscans ; and, strong as they were in their native confederacy, the allies determined to enlist the Cisalpine Gauls also in the common enterprise. The Romans flew to arms with undaunted spirit. The struggle that ensued was terrific, and seldom had the republic been brought into more signal peril. The imprudence of Fabius and the devotion of Decius were among the events by which this war was signalized. The Gauls, in their turn, complained that they were betrayed by the Etruscans, who were induced to desert their allies by a judicious movement of the Roman forces, which carried fire and sword into their defenceless territories. The fatal day of Sentinum ended with the defeat and immense slaughter of the Gauls and Samnites, more especially of the former.¹ When the Gauls were once more engaged by the Etruscans to combine with them, the Samnites were incapacitated from joining the new coalition. In this war the Romans were uniformly successful, and the contest was terminated by the great battle at the Vadimonian lake, where the Boii and Senones, the flower of the Cisalpine forces, were entirely defeated. The Romans could boast for the first time of having reduced their most formidable enemy to sue for peace.² The solicitations of the vanquished, however, were not made, or not listened to, till the nation of the Senones had been almost exterminated by Drusus, and their capital, Sena, transferred to the conquerors, who established a Roman colony within its walls. The victorious legions returned to the city with the actual treasure, as they fondly boasted, which had been

Coalitions of the Gauls with the Italians against Rome.
Triumph of
the Romans.

¹ Liv. x. 26.

² Liv. Epit. xii.

surrendered by their ancestors as the ransom of the Capitol.¹

These disasters effectually broke the strength of the Cisalpine Gauls, nor did they again venture to threaten the republic with invasion and conquest. The power of Rome gradually extended and consolidated itself in the Peninsula, and, during the interval of the first two Punic wars, her citizens carried their arms beyond the limits of Italy Proper, and effected the subjugation of the Boii and Insubres on the Po. The arrival of Hannibal presented an opportunity of deliverance and revenge. But the Gallic tribes did not rise simultaneously, as in former times, in reply to his call for assistance. He obtained succours from the Gauls, indeed, as from other nations of Italy, but not in such overwhelming numbers, nor with such zeal and confidence, as he had hoped and anticipated. It was against the genius and moral resources of the man that Rome had to contend in her wars with Hannibal, rather than against the spirit and energy of his allies. When these resources failed, the Gaulish auxiliaries, despairing of their own country, now deprived of its last defender, devoted themselves to the interests of their Carthaginian leaders, and followed the remnant of their host into Africa.²

Thus cowed in spirit and reduced in power, fortune favoured the Cisalpines with no more such golden opportunities. But they were yet untaught to submit to a foreign master; and while the Romans continued to strengthen their position on the Po by colonies and fortified works, the indignation of the natives frequently broke out in desultory and fruitless resistance. Under the Carthaginian Hamilcar, they attacked and destroyed Placentia¹; but their success was transitory, and repaid by a bloody defeat. Wars followed upon wars; treachery on their own part led to cruel retaliation on that of the enemy. The Boii at last broke up from their harassed and insulted homes, and migrated in a body to the banks of the Danube. The Romans gradually pushed their conquests to the foot of the Alps, and closed the defiles of the mountains against the reinforcements which might have poured in from the Further Gaul. Towards the end of the sixth century of the city, the whole region between the Rubicon and the Alps was reduced to the form of a Roman province, secured by numerous garrisons and watched with unremitting vigilance. The name of Gallia Cisalpina still remained, as a memorial of the people in whom the republic had found her most dangerous and most inveterate enemy; and every year, after the completion of his term of office, one of the consuls went forth with a numerous army to govern the province, which might be intrusted only to personages of the highest authority and greatest experience in the state.

Cisalpine Gaul reduced to the form of a province about the end of the sixth century of the city.

¹ Suet. Tib. 3.: "Drusus . . . traditur . . . pro praetore ex provincia Gallia retulisse aurum Senonibus olim in obsidione Capitolii datum, nec, ut fama est, extortum a Camillo."

² The Gauls and Ligurians formed together a third part of the Carthaginian forces at the battle of Zama. App. Pun. 40.

In the midst of these successes, however, the Romans had not neglected to secure their acquisitions within the barrier of the Alps by checking the movements of the Gallic tribes beyond it. Massilia, the modern Marseilles, had been founded some centuries before this era by a Grecian colony; but it was by slow and painful steps that this celebrated city extended its influence along the southern coast of Gaul. Notwithstanding the numerous maritime colonies which it established,

First transactions of the Romans beyond the Alps. Alliance with Massilia.

it with difficulty maintained its own existence against the tribes of the interior, and the intimate relations it cultivated with the great Italian republic from an early period were found to be of equal convenience to either party.

The Massilian aristocracy, which enjoyed the exclusive administration of the government¹, was purely mercantile, and possessed little or no territorial wealth. Like the other commercial settlements of the Greeks in ancient times, and many of the Italian republics of the middle ages, Massilia was unable to defend itself by the unassisted strength of its own native population. While other states, in similar circumstances, have depended upon the fidelity of mercenary troops, the Massilians rested their security mainly upon their alliance with Rome. Under the shelter of this great military power, their commerce flourished and expanded on all sides. Syracuse and Carthage were crushed by the universal conqueror; the maritime power of the Etrurians had already dwindled away before they fell under his baneful domination. The mercantile genius of Greece, which had migrated from Athens to Rhodes and Corinth, was impaired by internal weakness, and repressed by the harassing activity of the pirates in the eastern Mediterranean. Accordingly, Massilia reigned for a considerable period without a rival in the career of commerce. But her trade was mainly supplied by the produce and the wants of the vast continent which lay behind her. She opened regular communications with the interior of Gaul, and from thence with the ocean and the British isles; thus substituting a direct and safer route for the perilous circumnavigation of the Phœnician coasting vessels. The wines and other produce of the South found their way up the Rhone and Saone, then by a short portage to the Seine and ¹ Strab. iv. 1.; Aristot. Pol. v. 6.; Cæs. B. C. i. 35.; Cic. de Rep. i. 27.

Massilia, its position and resources

Loire, or across the plains of Languedoc, to the Garonne, and so to the coasts of the Atlantic.¹ The interchange of commodities between Gaul and Britain was constant and regular, producing a close moral and intellectual connexion between those distant regions. The riches which gradually accumulated in the emporium of all this traffic disposed the Massilians to cultivate the arts and enjoy the luxuries of their mother country; and their learned leisure was crowned with a reputation hardly anywhere exceeded beyond the bounds of Greece itself.² But the jealousy of the maritime tribes of southern Gaul was not appeased by the blandishments of commerce and social refinement. The Ligurians especially, the rudest and most restless of the number, were engaged in almost constant hostility with the Greek colonists. The position occupied by this people commanded the most practicable of the Alpine passes, where the mountains descend into the Mediterranean. The Romans had no object more at heart than to obtain possession of this key to Gaul; and the claims upon their assistance which their new ally was constantly making could not fail to afford them a pretext for seizing it.

The first interference of the Romans in the affairs of the Massilians occurred in the year of the city 600. Antipolis (Antibes), and Nicæa (Nice), two offsets from the original Hellenic stem, were beleaguered by the Ligurians, in the midst of whose territory they lay, and were on the point of surren-

The Romans
first interfere with the affairs of Trans-alpine Gaul in behalf of the Massilians.
A. U. 600.
B. C. 154.

¹ Strabo observes (iv. 1.) how conveniently the great rivers of Gaul lie for the purposes of commerce: οὕτως εὐφύως ἵσχει τὰ βεῖθρα πρὸς ζλληλα. The same is eminently the case as regards the construction of railroads. The three great valleys of the Saône, the Loire, and the Seine are separated by a table land of moderate elevation. At one period of the Roman domination the commerce of the whole of Gaul radiated from Autun, in the centre of this district.

² Strabo (l. c.) remarks that Massilia became a place of resort for the purpose of liberal education, not only to the Gauls, but even to the Romans themselves.

dering. The arrogant republic sent ambassadors to require the assailants to desist from an enterprise against the dependencies of an ally. But the mountaineers refused to listen to their representations, nor even allowed them to land. In making the attempt, Flaminus, the principal commissioner, was severely injured, and some lives were lost in the encounter. The deputation sailed away to Massilia, where the wounds of Flaminus were assiduously tended, while the news of the violence done to him was conveyed to Rome. The outrage was denounced as a violation of the law of nations, and so specious a pretext for decisive hostilities was embraced with eagerness. The Oxybii and Deceatæ were specially marked out for vengeance as the guilty tribes. An army was assembled at Placentia, under the consul Opimius. Ægitna, the offending town, was taken and sacked, and the armies of the audacious barbarians defeated after an ineffectual resistance. The consul gave up their territory to the Massilians, and compelled the rest of their kindred tribes to surrender hostages for their good behaviour. The Roman troops occupied the country through the winter; but it does not appear that they established fortresses, or made any permanent settlement there.¹

This first campaign of the Romans beyond the Alps had been short and easy, nor did its success contribute to the territorial aggrandisement of the republic. In the epitomes of the national history it was not thought worthy of mention.² In the year 629 a second occasion presented itself for pushing an army into Gaul. The wars of Fulvius Flaccus against the Salyi, and of Calvinus against the Vocontii, undertaken in the first

Formation of the Transal-pine province.

¹ Polyb. xxxiii. 7, 8.: Καὶ ταῦτα μὲν ὁξεῖαν ἔλαβε καὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν καὶ τὴν συντέλειαν.

² Florus (iii. 2.) says: "Primi trans Alpes arma nostra sensere Salyi."

instance at the request of the Massilians, led to the discovery of the medicinal springs of Aquæ Sextiæ (Aix), and the foundation of a Roman town within the lines of the consular encampment. Massilia gained a large accession of territory; but the Romans had set their foot firmly upon the soil of Gaul. From this moment wars succeeded one another with rapidity. The republic had now an interest of its own in the country to preserve and extend. It formed alliances with some of the native states, and made their grievances a pretext for assailing others. Hence its fierce contest with the Allobroges, and the Arverni and their king Bituitus, between whom and the Ædui, who claimed the friendship of Rome, there existed an ancient enmity.¹ The interference of the republic between these rival states led to new combinations and further aggressions, for most of the Gaulish tribes were bound to one or the other of them by ties of fear or interest. Fabius Maximus defeated with immense slaughter the forces of the Arverni and Allobroges near the banks of the Isere; his colleague Domitius inveigled Bituitus into his camp, treacherously cast him into chains, and sent him to Rome.² The senate censured the consul's perfidy, but failed not to profit by it. Bituitus was detained in Italy as a hostage for the submission of his people and of his son Congentiatus, who was destined to replace his father, after receiving a Roman education. During the progress of these events the whole tract of country between the Alps, the Rhone and the maritime possessions of the Massilians, was reduced to subjection. The territory of the Salluvii and Allobroges, comprehending the modern Savoy, was absorbed, together with that of many smaller tribes, in this extensive conquest, and the whole district received, by way of eminence, the appellation of the Province. The Arverni were treated with more consideration. Situated beyond the Rhone and the Cevennes¹, they were too remote to be an object of immediate cupidity to the invaders, and their power and influence were so great that it appeared more politic to accept them as allies than to threaten them with subjugation.

¹ A strict alliance was formed between the Romans and the Æduans, and the terms of brothers and kinsmen were frequently interchanged between them. Cæs. B. G. i. 43.; Tac. Ann. xi. 25.; Cic. ad Att. i. 19.

² Liv. Epit. lxi. lxii.; Oros. v. 14.; Flor. iii. 4.; Plin. H.N. vii. 50.

The Romans attached the highest importance to this outpost of their empire established ^{Importance of this province.} beyond the Alps. It was reserved as a consular province, and every year one of the consuls marched into it with an army, to maintain it in subjection and defend it from the intrigues and violence of the neighbouring tribes. But the principal object of the military governor was to extend its frontiers. In the years immediately ensuing, Manlius, Aurelius Cotta and Marcius Rex successively crossed the Rhone, and extended their operations to the Cevennes and the Pyrenees. Some tribes they conquered by arms, while the prompt submission of others, such as the Tectosages, gained for them the title and privileges of allies. These new acquisitions were maintained by the establishment of a colony at Narbo Martius (Narbonne), which at the same time kept Massilia in

¹ Strabo (iv. 2. fin.) describes the dependencies of the Arverni as extending to Narbo and the frontiers of the Massilian possessions in the south, but the centre of their power lay in the mountainous district of Auvergne. They were received, like the Ædui, into the alliance and friendship of Rome. Tacitus says that the Ædui alone of all the Gaulish nations were honoured by the Romans with the title of brothers. It is probable that Lucan, when he gives the Arverni a claim to this distinction (i. 428.), “Arvernique ausi Latio se fingere fratres, Sanguine ab Iliaco populi,” confuses them with the Ædui, both nations in his time being equally Romanized. It is remarkable that in his enumeration of the Gaulish nations, he omits all mention of the latter people.

check, and rivalled her in arts and commerce. The final subjugation of certain Alpine tribes by Marcius, the completion of the Domitian road along the coast of the Mediterranean, and the occupation of the Graian and Cottian passes afforded means of rapid access from Italy to every part of its transalpine possessions.¹

While the victorious republic was occupied with the organization of its new province, the foundations of its power were menaced by a great but transient revolution. The Roman annalists had already heard the distant rumour of vast national migrations among the Gaulish races; but, conspicuous as were their results in the constant irruption into Italy of new swarms of barbarians, their features were indistinct, and their causes unknown. The observation of the intelligent people of the south gradually became more keen, their interest more awakened. The movement of the Cimbri and Teutones, at the beginning of the seventh century of the city, which enfeebled Gaul, while it stimulated the aggressive spirit of the Romans, was more carefully noticed and more accurately detailed. The Cimbric peninsula seems to have been adopted as a place of refuge by a remnant of the mighty nation known by the cognate names of Cimmerii, Cimbri, or Kymry, left behind in the course of its westward progress, and cut off from the rear of the advancing host by the rapid influx of the Teutonic races behind it.² The Cimbric is generally recognised as one

Origin of the Cimbri and Teutones.

¹ Oros. v. 14.; Liv. Epit. lxiii. The campaign of Appius Claudius against the Salassi, A.U. 611, shows that at that early period the possession of the pass of the little St. Bernard was an object of importance. He defeated the hostile tribes; but we cannot suppose that one such victory was sufficient to give the Romans a permanent hold of their country. It is probable that both the Graian and Cottian passes were only used by them occasionally, and at the price of a stipulated payment.

² The Cimbri are designated as Gauls by Sallust, B.J. 114.; Cic. de pr. Cons. 13.; Flor. iii. 3.; Diod. Sic. v. 32.; Appian, Illyr. 4.

branch of the great Celtic family, and a broad line has always been drawn by ethnologists between this and the Teutonic. The union of the offspring of such inveterate foes in any common enterprize of magnitude has been pronounced impossible, and various conjectures have been hazarded to reconcile the statements of history with the supposed nature of things.¹ But the progress of knowledge on these subjects has served to smooth the difficulty. As our investigations proceed, we discover, on the one hand, more shades of distinction between the several branches of one principal family; on the other the differences between families themselves appear to be less decisively marked. Thus, among the Celtic populations of Gaul, we shall observe a Gaelic, a Cimbric, and perhaps a Belgic variety, each with peculiar characteristics, yet all blended together and maintaining a common affinity through various points of contact. To Cæsar's observation the connexion between the Celtic Belgians and the Teutonic Germans seemed more close than that between the different races of the same Celtic family. This view is no doubt essentially erroneous; but the fact that so accurate an observer should have made the mistake, may suffice to convince us how powerfully the accidents of intercourse and proximity may Plutarch, on the other hand, terms them Germans. (Mar. 11.) But little regard can be paid to these assertions on either side. Among recent and more critical authorities I observe that Zeuss (Deutschen und Nachbarstämme, p. 144.) maintains their German origin.

¹ Certain cantons in the mountains about Vicenza and Verona have been supposed from the peculiarity of their language to be peopled by the descendants of the Cimbri who penetrated into Italy. It is said that a Danish prince visited them and recognized the dialect as that of his own country. The language has indeed been proved to be German by M. Edwards (Lettre à Am. Thierry, p. 91.); but an Italian writer, Count Giovanelli, has discovered in Ennodius and Cassiodorus the fact of the establishment of a German colony in that district in the time of Theodoric, and it is to this immigration that their origin may be ascribed.

operate in sundering kindred and amalgamating independent elements. There seems therefore no objection to the supposition that the Celtic tribe, isolated, as has been described, from the rest of its brethren, and closely pressed by the vicinity of a Teutonic population, gradually assimilated itself to its immediate neighbours. The sudden occurrence of a common danger would naturally draw more closely the bonds of social alliance; the feelings of ancient antipathy would give way before the claims of mutual distress; and thus the representatives of widely divergent stocks might eventually combine in political union. We shall have occasion presently to notice a very similar case, the union of the Celtic Belgians with their German neighbours within the Rhine, when they associated together to resist the invasion of the Romans.¹

There is reason to believe that the low countries between the Elbe and the Baltic, which were the seats of the Cimbri and the Teutones, were harassed, in the early part of the seventh century, by a series of destructive inundations, followed by scarcity, famine, and pestilence.² The inhabitants of the neighbouring shores of Friesland and Holland might have combated these enemies with courage and industry, and by their persevering labour have kept their footing in the country. But the Cimbri and their neighbours had no local attachment, and little of local interest to bind them to the soil they occupied. Nations are slow in losing the habit of movement,

Their great migration to the south
early in the seventh century of the city.

¹ It will be seen that the Cimbri and Teutones were afterwards joined by the Helvetii and Ambrones, both of them undoubtedly belonging to the Celtic family.

² Appian (Illyr. 4.) says that the country of the Cimbri was afflicted by earthquakes and pestilence. Strabo (vii. 2.) alludes to a report that their migration was caused by an inundation of the waters of the sea. He is disposed to doubt the truth of this account, but gives no satisfactory reason for disputing it.

and the confidence with which their fathers had repeatedly wandered forth in quest of new settlements had not abated in the later generation. The Cimbri and Teutones made a joint resolution to migrate in one mass, and seek new abodes in the south, wherever fortune might permit them to establish themselves.¹ The inhabitants of northern Germany were thinly scattered, without fortresses or fixed habitations; they offered no resistance to the progress of the invader, nor inducements to his stay. The central regions of the continent were, indeed, for the most part covered with forests and unoccupied by man. Accordingly, from the shores of the Baltic to the Danube, and even to the foot of the Rhaetian Alps, was, as it were, but one step to this gigantic emigration. But here the Romans rushed forward oppose them and are defeated.

The Romans
A. U. 641.
B. C. 113.

to stem the torrent, the character of which they had been taught to fear by experience at their own doors. They seized the passes of the mountains, and commanded the invaders to retire from the territories of a people whom the great republic entitled her friends. The barbarians were appalled by this bold defiance from an enemy whom they had never yet seen, but whose fame was bruited throughout Europe. They paused in their career, and offered to apologize for an insult committed in ignorance. The Roman general, Papirius Carbo, suddenly attacked their camp, while he delayed the return of the envoys they had sent to wait upon him.² But neither his perfidy nor his arms succeeded in averting the danger. The bloody combat which ensued terminated in the defeat of the Romans with such loss, that they would have been unable at the moment to retain possession of the passes, had the enemy had presence of mind to follow up his victory.¹ But the barbarians were yet undecided as to their future course. They contented themselves with spoiling the undefended countries south of the Danube, until, having gorged themselves with booty during a three years' sojourn, they changed the direction of their march towards Gaul, and entered it with the favour and co-operation of the most powerful of the Helvetic tribes.

¹ A remnant were left behind. Strabo mentions that the Cimbri, in the time of Augustus, sent an embassy to apologize for the temerity of their ancestors. The emperor seems to have regarded them as a German people (see Monum. Ancyra. v. 16.): "Cimbrique et Chariides et Semnones et ejusdem tractus alii Germanorum populi." By that time they had probably lost every trace of their Celtic descent. Comp. Tac. Germ. 37.

² Appian, Gall. fr. 13.: Οἱ δὲ Τεύτονες . . . προσέπεμπον ἀγνοῆσαι τε τὴν ἐς Πωμαῖον Ναοικῶν ξενίαν . . . αὐτὸς δὲ . . . ἀδοκήτως ἀνα-

The vast multitude now spread itself with augmented numbers over the Belgian territory, having crossed its frontier between the Rhine and the Jura. In some districts it met with resistance, and was engaged in sanguinary struggles, but generally the inhabitants hastened to propitiate the foe by the offer of hospitality and an appeal to the ties of kindred.² The invaders showed no disposition to rest from their wanderings in the territories which they might have extorted from the native population; in the country of the Eburones, they reserved only the city of Aduatuca, as a magazine for their stores and booty, and an asylum for their young and aged, who could no longer endure

They turn to the West, enter and overrun Gaul.

παναμένοις ἔτι τοῖς Τεύτοσιν ἐμπεσὼν ἔδωκε δίκην ἀπιστίας. It may be conjectured that the apology of the Teutones was a pretence, and that while they promised to abstain from injuring the Noricans, they had no intention of quitting the neighbourhood, where their position necessarily gave umbrage to Rome.

¹ The battle is said to have taken place at Noreia. (Strabo, v. 1.) Noreia is supposed by Groskurd (Strabo, in loc.) to be the modern Friesach, in Carinthia, between the Mur and the Drave. Walckenaer (Geog. des Gaules, ii. 80.) places it at Noring, near Gmund.

² Strabo says that the Belgæ alone throughout Gaul were able to resist the invaders; but Cæsar (B.G. ii. 4.) seems to confine this success to those tribes in Belgium which were of German origin.

the fatigues of endless adventure.¹ The combined hordes next turned towards the south of Gaul, where they met with no serious impediment to their progress: it was not till they had exhausted the resources of the regions which lay in their way, that their rapacity was tempted by the rich and flourishing possessions of the Roman power. In the Province they declared their intention of taking up their abode, and here they boldly demanded an assignment of lands from the proconsul Silanus. He refused con-

They defeat
the proconsul,
Silanus:

temptuously, and proceeded confidently to the attack. But the ponderous masses of the barbarians overpowered the skill and science of the legionaries; and it was chiefly by its natural barriers that the Province was protected from invasion, till a second army could be sent into the field. The arrival, indeed, of these fresh forces

Cassius and Scaurus:

only brought with it new defeats. Cassius was routed with one army, himself slain², and the remnant of his legions compelled to pass under the yoke. Scaurus was taken prisoner in another quarter, with the total loss of a second. The Cimbri deliberated whether they should not at once cross the Alps and carry their arms into Italy; but scared by their captive's resolute defiance, they preferred securing their position in the Province, and reducing the towns in the interior, a difficult and laborious task to an unskilled and undisciplined multitude. Rome put forth her resources, and assembled another powerful army to cover the cities of the

¹ Aduatuca, according to D'Anville, is the modern Falais. Others identify it with Tongres. It may be recognised, perhaps, from the particular description which Cæsar (B.G. ii. 29.) gives of the locality. Its inhabitants in his time were the descendants of the Cimbri garrison.

² Liv. Epit. lxv. : "In finibus Allobrogum." Oros. v. 15. says, "Tigurinos usque ad Oceanum persecutus," which I can only suppose is a strange mistake for the Lacus Lemanus. Thierry, Gaulois, II. iii. : "A la vue des remparts de Genève."

Mediterranean. But now her generals Cæpio and Manlius, did not act in concert; the jealous pretensions of the one ruined both himself and his colleague. The two camps were forced one after the other on the same day; the rout was more complete, and the slaughter more overwhelming, than had befallen the republic since the fields of Cannæ and the Allia. On the one hand, the Province, with all its wealthy colonies and commercial establishments, lay defenceless at the feet of the invaders; on the other the Alps were unguarded, and a bold advance might carry desolation into the heart of Italy. Rome trembled at the name of the Cimbri, which recalled to her all the horrors of Gallic invasion.¹ Never did fortune better deserve the offerings of her favourite worshippers than when she averted both these impending dangers, and directed the more enterprising of the barbarian hordes towards the frontiers of Spain, while she engaged the remainder in the enjoyment of ease and luxury on the spot where they had won their triumphs. The main body of the invaders was occupied in an inglorious incursion beyond the Pyrenees for the space of two years. During this breathing time, the Romans recovered from their consternation, and magnanimously broke through their ordinary rules to appoint Marius to the command, and to give him the authority of the consulship for three years successively. The new general reached the province before the enemy's return, and the great military works which he effected for the

But invade Spain instead of penetrating into Italy.

¹ The figure of the Cimbrian warrior which Marius painted in derision on a shield, and set up in a conspicuous part of the forum (if Mariano be not a corruption for Manliano, see Cic. de Orat. ii. 66.), was an imitation of a similar mockery of a much earlier date, commemorating probably (comp. Liv. vii. 10.) the victory of Manlius over the gigantic Gaul. The terms Cimbri and Galli were used by the Romans of that day as synonymous; the precise distinction between them will be shown presently.

security and convenience of his future operations had already marked his energy and foresight, before the opposing forces took the field. The barbarians had now resolved to invade Italy. They divided their armament, with the view of crossing the mountains simultaneously from the west and the north, and meeting at an appointed spot on the banks of the Po. The Cimbri and Helvetii took the longer circuit; the Teutones and Ambrones were to cut their way through Marius's legions, and penetrate the Cottian or the Maritime Alps.¹

The events of the short campaign which followed, as preserved in Plutarch's picturesque narrative, are more than usually striking.

Marius takes the command.
His great victory at Aquæ Sextiæ:
A. U. 652.
B. C. 102.

The admiration in which the Roman general's name was so long held by his countrymen caused them to treasure up every quaint rudeness which fell from the rough soldier's lips during the awful moments of suspense preceding the final catastrophe. But we must confine our hasty glance to the great encounter which took place in the neighbourhood of Aquæ Sextiæ. After the unprecedented series of six successive defeats sustained by the Romans in conflict with their formidable enemy, they here gained a victory which retrieved all their former losses. The barbarians were totally exterminated, the survivors of that bloody day falling one by one under the vengeance of the provincials, while vainly endeavouring to escape northwards. The enumeration of the slain is given with great variations by the different historians. The whole horde was, in fact, annihilated; and the dead, lying unburied upon the field, gave to it the frightful appellation of the Putrid Plain, which seems still to be retained in the name of Pourrières, a village which marks the spot.² The husbandman, it is said, fenced his vineyard with the bones of the giants of the north; but the greater portion of the ghastly mass sank gradually into the soil, and the fields on which the Roman and the Teuton fought and fell on that terrible day became celebrated for their rank fertility.¹

¹ Plut. Mar. 15. ² Plut. Mar. 15—24.; Thierry, Gaulois, II. iii.

The enterprise of the Cimbric horde, though more successful in the outset, was crowned with disaster no less overwhelming. The barbarians descended into Italy by the

And at Vercellæ.
Destruction of the invading hordes.

¹ The French antiquaries have taken great interest in tracing the existing monuments and traditions of these events. (See Mém. Soc. Antiq. Franç. ix. 48., xvi. 1.) The localities, it seems, may be distinctly pointed out in the valley of the Arc, about ten miles east of Aix. The ancient names of several hills and villages are still preserved in their modern appellations. The Mont Ste. Victoire, on the side of which the army of Marius was arrayed, evidently derives its name from the battle. The people of the neighbourhood have kept festival there from time immemorial, and the addition of the term Saint, together with the Christian exterior given to the solemnities, may be ascribed to the pious policy of the mediæval church. "Les habitans de Pertuis," says M. Castellan, "petite ville au-delà de la Durance, à trois lieues d'Aix, paraissent en avoir mieux conservé la tradition que tous les autres peuples du voisinage. Ils s'y rendent au bruit des tambours, et des fifres. Des prieurs nommés annuellement, choisis pour diriger la marche et maintenir le bon ordre, se chargent aussi de la subsistance des pèlerins, parmi lesquels se trouvent des personnes des deux sexes et même des enfans. Arrivés sur le sommet, après une journée de marche par des chemins peu praticables, ils campent en plein air; et dès que la nuit commence, ils mettent le feu à un grand monceau de broussailles, sautant tout autour en signe d'allégresse. Répété à Pertuis, aussitôt que la flamme y est aperçue, ils font entendre réciproquement, au lointain, a cris redoublés, ces paroles dignes de remarque, 'Victoire, Victoire !'" Compare this account with Plutarch's narrative, Mar. 22.: μετὰ δὲ τὴν μάχην διάριος τῶν βαρβαρῶν διπλῶν καὶ λαφύρων τὰ μὲν ἐκπρεπῆ καὶ δλόκληρα . . . ἐπέλεξε τῶν δὲ ἄλλων ἐπὶ πυρᾶς μεγάλης κατασωρένσας τὸ πλῆθος ἔθυσε θυσίαν μεγαλοπρεπῆ καὶ τοῦ στρατοῦ περιεστῶτος ἐν διπλοῖς ἐστεφανωμένου, περιζωσάμενος αὐτὸς, ὥστερ ἔθος ἐστὶν, ἀναλαβὼν τὴν περιπόρφυρον καὶ λαβὼν δᾶδα καιομένην, καὶ δι' ἀμφοτέρων τῶν χειρῶν ἀνασχῶν πρὸς τὸν οὐρανὸν, ἔμελλεν ὑφῆσειν τῇ πυρᾷ . . . μεγάλης οὖν χαρᾶς τοῖς ἐπιυικίοις προσγενομένης δι στρατὸς ὑφῆδονῆς ἐνοπλίῳ τινὶ κρότῳ καὶ πατάγῳ συνηλάλαξαν. Thierry (Gaulois, l. c.) adds another interesting illustration of the same tradition; "Le matelot Provençal, près d'entrer dans la rade de Marseille, montrant au voyageur le sommet lointain de la montagne, lui dit aujourd'hui, comme disaient ses ancêtres d'Arélaté ou de Fosse: 'Voilà le temple de la Victoire !'"

pass of the Brenner, and drove before them the troops commanded by Catulus, the aristocratic colleague of Marius. They crossed the Adige and reached the banks of the Po, where they expected to meet their companions, whose absence surprised but did not seriously disquiet them. Unfavourable rumours began to be heard around them; but the Cimbri were too confident in the invincibility of the tribes by whose side they had so often conquered to apprehend the possibility of their destruction. They persisted for some months in awaiting their promised arrival, and consumed the period of inaction in the sensual indulgences to which the charms of climate and abundance invited them. At last Marius appeared before them at the head of his victorious legions. The Romans announced their triumph and the annihilation of the Teutons, with bitter sarcasms; nor were the Cimbri backward in preparing for a final struggle. The great battle of the Campus Raudius, near Vercellæ, whither the barbarians seem to have advanced by a lateral movement in quest of their expected allies, gave another complete victory to the Roman arms. The slaughter of the invading army was not less entire than that of the other division; and the republic preserved a lasting monument of the peril from which it had been rescued in the titles and rewards which it showered upon the head of its champion.

When the cloud of danger had passed away, the Oppression of the Province. Romans might have remembered with gratitude the fidelity with which the provincials had resisted the temptation to join the invaders. With the single exception of the Volcæ Tectosages¹, whose apparent connexion with the Belgians may have caused them to sympathize with the Cimbri, the Gallic tribes of the south gave intruders no encouragement. But their constancy was attributed to timidity, and the exactions of the oppressor were restrained neither by fear nor remorse. The victorious soldiers demanded lands; the plundered citizens clamoured for compensation. It was decreed that the districts of the Province which the strangers had occupied should not be restored to their original proprietors, but divided among the claimants of the ruling nation. When the Gauls ventured to complain, it was coldly replied, that their lands having been lost to the Cimbri, the republic had acquired, by reconquest, a right to their possession.¹ Such was the notion of the relations of ruler and subject which found favour among the governors of a state proud alike of its principles of jurisprudence and of its military prowess. The natives sullenly submitted; but this ill-treatment had rendered them now, whatever they may have been before, foes to Rome and secret conspirators against her. Nor was this all, for poverty and disappointment compelled them to seek bare subsistence from arms and violence. Henceforth they had no hope but in the chances of tumult and confusion. This soon appeared; for the event of the Social war, which drove the proscribed adherents of Marius in great

¹ Dion, Fr. 97.: Στασιάσασα πρὸς τὰς τῶν Κιμερῶν ἐλπίδας. The temerity of the Volcæ cost them their independence, for they were allies and not subjects of the republic, though the Romans had invented a pretext for introducing a garrison into their city, Tolosa.

Disaffection of
the provin-
cials: they side with the Marians and Sertorius.

Having risen and overpowered this military force, they were marked out for vengeance by Servilius Cæprio, who was aware of the great riches which the city contained. He took advantage of the absence of the Cimbri in Spain, attacked Tolosa, and gave it up to plunder. But the treasure which had formed a part of the spoil of Delphi was fated to bring a curse upon its possessors, and the end of Cæprio was not more prosperous than that of the people whom he reduced to servitude. Strab. iv. 1.

¹ Appian, B.C. i. 29.: 'Ο μὲν Ἀπουλήιος νόμον εἰσέφερε διαδάσασθαι γῆν, δοῦν ἐν τῇ νῦν ὑπὸ Ρωμαίων καλούμενη Γαλατία Κιμεροὶ, γένος Κελτῶν, κατειλήφεσαν· καὶ αὐτοὺς δὲ Μάριος ἔναγχος ἐξελάσας τὴν γῆν ὡς οὐκέτι Γαλατῶν ἐσ Ρωμαίους περιεσπάκει.'

numbers into this region, the cradle of his glory and the adopted home of many of his veterans, found the Gauls disposed to embrace the invitations of their shattered party, and avenge its cause upon the Roman government. From Gaul Sertorius derived a great part of his resources ; the Province threw itself into the arms of his lieutenants, and accepted the decrees of his senate, composed of fugitives of the Marian faction.¹ When Pompeius was sent by the nobles to crush the Iberian revolt, he was compelled to make good his footing in the Gaulish province before he could venture to cross the Pyrenees. The Marians indeed made but a feeble resistance. The vengeance of the Roman general and of Fonteius, who was charged with the restoration of the senate's authority, fell upon the unfortunate natives with more weight than ever.² From many of their cities, such as Tolosa, Ruscino, and Biterræ, they were immediately expelled, and colonies of the conquering people planted in their room. The success which finally crowned the arms of the republic in Spain fastened the yoke of servitude still more firmly upon their necks. Fonteius continued to exercise the functions of proconsul, and organized throughout the country

Tyranny of Fonteius : he is impeached, and defended
by Cicero.

a system of tyranny, which may be sufficiently appreciated even from the pleadings of Cicero in its defence. The orator makes no attempt to refute the charges of avarice and extortion brought against his client otherwise than by contemptuously rejecting the credibility of any testimony of a Gaul against a Roman. Cicero's apology is indeed a more instructive exposition of the horrors of provincial suffering than any hostile impeachment. The contumelious indifference it breathes to the rights of a foreign subject implies much more than a consciousness of the guilt of the accused. It shows how frightfully even a sage's mind could be warped by national prejudice and the pride of dominion; it further indicates what was the temper of the senatorial body presiding on the bench, before whom such an overt denial of justice could be vaunted. Pompeius, who had professed to purify the tribunals and to pacify just complaints, withheld his countenance from an accusation against a creature of his own. The whole force of the aristocratic party arrayed itself in vindication of its privileges. The judges absolved the culprit, and the suppliants relapsed into apparent submission, still brooding over the wrongs of their country and meditating revenge. Not only was Fonteius acquitted, but his system of oppression continued unrelaxed.¹ The provincials were overwhelmed with debts contracted to discharge their public burdens, the pressure of which had been aggravated by successive years of famine. Nor was the surrender of lands and goods sufficient to satisfy the law and the creditor as long as the obligation was not wholly redeemed. The debtor himself might be sold, together with his wife and family, into the most cruel slavery. He might be driven to labour in chains on the public works, or to wait as a menial on the commands of a Roman colonist. Such was the system pursued by the remorseless policy of the Republic, and such the result upon which even the reformer and philanthropist could look with complacency.

¹ Oros. v. 23, compared with Cæs. B.G. iii. 20.

² Thierry, Gaulois, II. iv.

Nevertheless, the Gauls still continued to hope for justice at the hands of the Roman people. The Allobroges, plunged into desperate poverty by the pressure of their debts, threatening the confiscation of their entire territory, sent an embassy to Rome to

The Allobroges send deputies to Rome to solicit justice: they are tampered with by Catilina.

¹ Another governor of the province, Calpurnius Piso, was accused of similar tyranny, again defended by Cicero, and again acquitted by the judges. (Cic. pro Flacc. 39.) Among the atrocities which, on another occasion, Cicero imputed to P. Clodius were his extortions in Gaul as quaestor. Cic. de Har. Resp. 20.

plead their cause and sue for mercy. During the secret progress of Catilina's machinations, the foreign deputies were deplored the frustration of their hopes by delay and neglect. In this mood they were craftily addressed by Umbrenus, a creature of the conspirators, and at the same time a person well known to the Gauls, among whom he had lived and trafficked. He condoled with them on their misfortunes, sympathized with their sense of wrong, confirmed them in their fear that no reparation was to be obtained from the justice or clemency of the ruling powers, and finally, when he had moved their indignation and despair to the proper pitch, revealed to them the existence of a plot for the overthrow of the government. Nothing could be so opportune, he said, to its success as an outbreak in the transalpine province, which was in fact already partially disturbed. Nothing could be so agreeable to the conspirators, or so strongly command their favour and grateful recollection. The Allobroges had it in their power to avenge themselves at one blow upon the party from whose tyranny they suffered, and to secure from the victors every reward and advantage they could desire.¹

At first the delegates lent a willing ear to a proposition so alluring and unexpected. But They reveal the conspiracy to Cicero. a moment's reflection suggested to them a safer means of obtaining their end. They took counsel with Fabius Sanga, the patron and advocate of their nation, disclosed to him the whole occurrence, and by his advice offered to betray every circumstance to the consul. The fortune of the republic thus prevailed at the crisis of her utmost peril; such evidence was placed in the hands of the government as sufficed to put it on its guard against the impending danger. The Allobroges were directed to enter warmly into the plot, to attend the meetings at which it was discussed, to obtain written and sealed assurances from the chief conspirators, in which the invitation to insurrection and promise of reward should be distinctly conveyed. When their hands were full of these fatal documents they were seized, according to agreement, by the agents of the consul, and the treason stood revealed to the world.

¹ Sall. B.C. 40.; Cic. in Catil. iii. 6.

We may suppose that the consul and senate were not slow to promise their favour to the foreigners, in return for a service the importance of which they recognised in the most public manner.¹ But it is extremely doubtful whether the Allobroges derived any benefit from the fidelity of their representatives. Harassed and disappointed, they allowed the conspirators to rouse them at last to actual rebellion.² The insurgents invaded the frontiers of the Province, and attempted to excite a general movement among the population. A moment earlier this would have caused great alarm and been pregnant with serious danger; but the senate had recovered its confidence with the fall of Lentulus and his colleagues, and a vigorous campaign, under the conduct of Pomptinus, sufficed to reduce the Gauls once more to their former subjection.³

We have thus traced step by step the slow and indignant retreat of Gallic independence from the Apennines and the Tiber to the Garonne and Cevennes. Civilization has triumphed over barbarism: the one gave union to the Romans, and a distinct object as well as method to their policy; while the other, notwithstanding the external cultivation of the senate.

Ingratitude of
The Allobroges revolt, and are subdued.

A. U. 698.
B. C. 61.
Reflections on the contest between the Romans and Gauls.

¹ Cic. in Catil. iv. 3.: "Hesterno die præmia legatis Allobrogum dedistis amplissima."

² Sall. B.C. 42.

³ Dion, xxxvii. 47, 48.: Cic. de Prov. Cons. 13.; Liv. Epit. ciii.

their principal tribes, still kept the Gauls asunder by petty jealousies and divisions. Though identified for the most part one with another in the great features of language and character, there existed among them certain shades of difference, both in origin and sentiments, and this disadvantage was aggravated by their want of foresight and mutual self-control. The conquest of Gaul is one of the most complete and distinct episodes in Roman history; but its interest and value as a portion of human annals must be lost to those who fail to discriminate between the various elements of which the vanquished race consisted. When Cæsar distinguished so carefully between the different populations of Gaul, it was not merely in the spirit of the antiquarian that he placed his information on record. He wrote as the practical warrior and statesman, who had thoroughly scanned their means of resistance and estimated with sagacity the moral and material resources from which he had the fairest province of his empire to form.

The original authorities from which we learn the main facts regarding the ethnology and character of the Gauls are, as is well known, principally two, Cæsar himself and Strabo. The first lived for nine years in the heart of the country, and spoke of the state of things which he himself witnessed, with all the advantages of acute observation and consummate literary ability; the second, better acquainted in his own person with the East than the West, depended partly upon the accumulated knowledge of a century later, and partly on the accounts of Posidonius¹, who had travelled in Gaul in the time of

Sources of our knowledge regarding Gaulish
ethnology.

¹ Posidonius is frequently referred to by Strabo, particularly in books iii. iv. and xi. He visited Massilia and the Narbonensis, was born A.U. 619, and died A.U. 703. (Ukert, Georg. der G. und R. i. 174.)

Marius. A careful criticism may employ the one of these authorities to explain or correct the other; and their respective statements, where apparently conflicting, may possibly be reconciled by the consideration of the different circumstances under which they wrote. The outline here presented of the antiquities of Gaulish history is the result of a comparison of both, together with such additional illustrations as modern research and reflection have enabled us to supply.¹

The population of that large portion of the European continent which was known to the ancients by the name of Gallia was distributed in four principal divisions, varying more or less in origin, in language and institutions.

I. Southern Gaul, from the Garonne to the Pyrenees, and along the coast of the Mediterranean, was mainly occupied by a race altogether distinct from their Gallic neighbours. Under the name of Iberi, they have generally been considered as a remnant of a family of nations which occupied much of the southern part of Europe before the arrival of the great Celtic race in the West. The Iberians, it is supposed, were originally thrust out of Gaul into Spain, and many of them were again driven back to their old homes, when the Celtic race first penetrated through the Pyrenees. Of the older race, such as neither submitted to the new comers nor mingled with them² were compelled, for the most part, to make their escape through the western and eastern outlets of the mountains, whence Quadruple division of ancient Gaul.

¹ I have been principally guided by Thierry's elaborate history: see particularly the Introduction, which has been much enlarged in the third edition, Paris, 1845.

² The Celtiberi, a people widely spread in the Spanish peninsula, were said to be of a mixed race of conquerors and conquered. (Diodor. Sic. v. 33.; comp. Lucan, iv. 9.)

they spread themselves to the Garonne on the one side, to the Cevennes, the Rhone and the Alps on the other. They became known in the West and the East respectively by the names of Aquitani and Ligures. In the former region they remained stationary; on the other side they continued to push forward, driving the Sicani before them, and finally established themselves along the coast of the Mediterranean from the Pyrenees to the river Macra.¹ We have seen how the whole of this coast fell gradually into the hands of the Greeks of Massilia and the Roman invaders. The Aquitani continued to occupy the triangle between the Pyrenees, the Garonne and the Bay of Biscay, within which they formed a confederacy, holding little intercourse with the Gaulish tribes beyond the river, speaking a language² and maintaining institutions peculiar to themselves, but jealously watched and controlled by the colonies of the republic at Narbo, Biterræ, and Tolosa.

II. The Gauls, properly so called, the Galatæ of the Greeks, the Galli of the Romans, and

II. The Ga-lates, Galli, or Gael.

the Gael of modern history, formed the van of the great Celtic migration³ which had poured westward at various intervals during many hundred years. Their origin, as well as the causes and events of their early movements, is lost in the night of ages. Having overrun the south of Gaul

¹ Thucyd. vi. 2.; Avien. Or. Marit. 132., &c.

² Strab. iv. 1. init. (comp. 2. init.): Τοὺς Ἀκονιτανοὺς τελέως ἐξηλασμένους, οὐ τῇ γλώττῃ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῖς σώμασιν, ἐμφερεῖς ἰθηρσι μᾶλλον οὐ Γαλαταῖς. (Compare Zeuss, die Deutschen und die Nachbarstämme, p. 163.)

³ The term Celtæ, Celts, which is now generally adopted as the generic appellation of one of the principal families of the human race, was confined by the ancients to the Gauls, and seems to have had originally a still more limited signification, as the designation of certain tribes in the neighbourhood of Marseilles. Strab. iv. 1. fin.: Ἀπὸ τούτων δὲ οἷμαι καὶ τοὺς σύμπαντας Γαλατὰς Κελτοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἐλλήνων προσαγορευθῆναι.

and penetrated into Spain, they lost a part of the territory thus acquired, and the restoration of the Iberian fugitives to Aquitania placed a barrier between the Celts in Spain and their brethren whom they had left behind them in the north. In the time of the Romans the Galli were found established in the centre and east of the country denominated Gaul, forming for the most part a great confederation, at the head of which stood the Arverni.¹ It was the policy of the Romans to raise the Ædui into competition with this dominant tribe, and with this view they distinguished them, as we have seen, with especial marks of favour. The Arverni, whose name is retained in the modern appellation of Auvergne, occupied a large district in the middle and south of Gaul, and were surrounded by tributary or dependent clans. The Ædui lay more to the north and east, and the centre of their possessions is marked by the position of their capital Bibracte, the modern Autun, situated in the highlands which separate the waters of the Loire, the Seine and the Saone.² The one nation was better placed for defence, the other for commerce; and with the spread of riches and civilization, the ancient influence of the Arverni seemed on the point of giving way to the more active ambition of their rivals. Other Gallic tribes stretched beyond the Saone: the Sequani³, who afterwards made an attempt to usurp this coveted pre-eminence; the Helvetii and other mountain races, whose scanty pastures extended to the sources of the Rhine; the Allobroges, who dwelt upon the Isere and Rhone¹, and who were the first of their race to meet and the first to succumb before the prowess of the Roman legions. According to the classification both of Cæsar and Strabo, the Turones, Pictones and Santones must be comprised under the same general denomination. It is probable, however, that the relationship in these three cases was not so close, as these tribes do not appear to have formed a part of the political confederation of the Galli.

¹ The power of the Arverni might be estimated, says Strabo (iv. 2.), by the many contests they maintained with Rome, and the numbers they brought into the field: Διέτειναν δὲ τὴν ἀρχὴν μέχρι Ναρεῶν, καὶ τῶν δρων τῆς Μασσαλιώτιδος ἐκράτουν δὲ καὶ τῶν μέχσι: Πυρήνης ἐθνῶν, καὶ μέχρι Ὀκεάνου καὶ Ρήνου; after which he gives an instance of the barbaric splendour of their king Bittus or Bituitus.

² Strabo places them between the Arar (Saone) and the Dubis, by which he evidently means the Liger (Loire). He makes the same mistake in this name twice. See Groskurd's Strabo, iv. 3. § 2.

³ The valley of the Doubs formed the centre of the Sequanese territory, which reached to the Jura and the Rhine, Strab. iv. 3.

III. It will be seen that the limits thus assigned to that portion of the ancient Celtic population of Gaul which is appropriately designated by the term Galli, embrace at least the whole centre and east of the country. Beyond the Seine and Marne, the north-east was occupied by a race whom Cæsar characterizes as not less different from the Galli in language, manners and institutions², than were the Iberi, whom modern ethnologists represent as belonging to a distinct family. To this race he gives the name of Belgæ, and informs us that in their own estimation they were principally descended from a German stock, the offspring of some early migration across the Rhine. According to Cæsar's view, the Gallic race extended much further than the limits above assigned to it, and included the people of the north-west, from the mouth of the Loire to that of the Seine; whereas Strabo, following probably the information of Posidonius, gives the whole of Gaul north of the Loire to the Belgæ. At the same time,

III. The Belgæ; discrepancy between Cæsar and Strabo.

¹ The settlements of the Allobroges occupied the space between these two rivers, and extended also a little beyond the latter into the modern province of Franche Comté.

² Cæs. B.G. i. 1.; comp. Strab. iv. 3. init.

the geographer by no means concurred in Cæsar's view of the origin of this third race, which he believed to be Gaulish and not German, though differing widely from the Galli, or Gauls of the central region. According to his account we should regard them as a variety of Celts, distinct both from the Iberi on the one side, and the Teutons on the other. In order to explain these conflicting statements, we must observe that Cæsar's account is not strictly consistent with itself, for certain among the Belgic tribes he contrasts with the rest as being German by origin, and forming separate leagues among themselves for mutual defence in the midst of jealous and probably alien neighbours.¹ The great mass, therefore, even of the Belgæ were still Celts; but, as the immigration of Teutons was an event of gradual progress, it is reasonable to suppose that in the time of Posidonius the population beyond the Seine was as yet little tainted with the admixture of the foreign element. At that period the middle race between the Loire and the Seine may have been more akin to the Belgæ, as Strabo, viewing them with the eyes of the earlier writer, represents, than with the Galli, south of the Loire, to whom Cæsar, on the contrary, assimilates them. We may conclude that, with whatever mixture of German blood, still, even in the time of Cæsar, the main element of the whole population of the north was Celtic, differing from the Gallic subdivision of the family, and required to be designated by a distinctive appellation. This fact of the division of the Gauls into two races is one of great importance in the history of the Celtic family, though its announcement seems to have been left to very modern times.¹ It may be traced, however obscurely, in several ways, which can only be cursorily indicated here. Thus, for instance, the existence in the neighbouring island of Britain, of two Celtic races, the Gael and the Kymry, with different types of language and feature, is well known. In Gaul there remain at the present day vestiges of only one of these languages, the Kymric, which is still spoken in some portion of Brittany, a district included, as we have seen, in the Belgica of Strabo. The common theory, that the population of this country is the offspring of certain immigrations from the opposite coast, is wholly untenable.² The supposition that the three scanty infusions of Kymric blood which alone are recorded by genuine history, should have sufficed to change the language and physical character of the whole people of the peninsula is inconsistent with the doctrine of the permanence of type in the majority of every mixed population, which modern experience so strongly attests. The Kymry, then, as distinguished from the Gael, were the first known inhabitants of this part of Gaul, and probably of Belgica in general.

Theory of the division of the Gauls into two races, the Gael and the Kymry.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 4, 5. The Belgæ themselves only affirmed that most of them (plerosque) were of German origin, and Tacitus remarked among them a certain "affectatio Germanicæ originis."

Further evidence of this division of races may be discovered, it is said, in the different types of feature which are still strongly characteristic of the population of the north and south respectively. This, undoubtedly, is a subject which requires much closer investigation than it has yet received before it can be regarded as furnishing substantive and independent evidence of the facts in question. Yet it is too interesting and important to be altogether omitted. A curious observer has distinguished, among a great mass of what may be called neutral characters, two opposite types of form and feature prevalent in different parts of Gaul respectively.¹ In the one the shape of the head is long and oval, the forehead high and narrow, the nose curved downwards and pointed, the chin small. This type of head is generally accompanied with a tall and spare figure, and prevails throughout the northern parts of Gaul, the Belgica of Strabo. The other is distinguished by a flat head, a forehead low and broad, the face round or approaching to square, the chin prominent, the nose small and straight or turning upwards; the corresponding stature is short and the figure thick. This is the type which prevails in the centre and east of France. The one type occurs throughout the seats of the Kymry, the other in those of the Gael. It will be readily admitted that, among the Celtic populations of our own islands, the latter of these types is strongly characteristic of the Highland Gael and also of the Irish. The former answers precisely to the characters most generally prevalent among the Welsh, though in Wales there is undoubtedly a large intermixture of the other type also.

¹ I believe that Thierry was the first to discuss it scientifically. The introduction to the third edition of the Hist. des Gaulois notices the favour with which the theory has been received. Niebuhr gave a hint of the same view in his lectures on Roman history, delivered before Thierry's work, but published since. (Lect. on Rom. Hist. ii. 1. 44.) On the other hand, Arnold criticizes and hesitates to adopt it. (Hist. of Rome, i. c. 24.)

² Three such are particularly mentioned: the first, A.D. 285, when Constantius Chlorus assigned lands to some fugitives in the territory of the Curosolitæ; the second, a century later, when Conan Meriadec followed the usurper Maximus from Britain, and obtained a sovereignty in Armorica after his defeat; and the third, some years after, when the same Conan invited a few settlers to confirm his power in the Peninsula. (Daru, Hist. de Bretagne, i. 53.) The stories of subsequent immigrations of the Kymry in the fifth century are regarded by Niebuhr as undoubtedly fabulous.

But if there exists even at the present day certain physical characteristics which seem to attest the early diversity of the great races by which Gaul was occupied, we may dis-

Evidence of this division from physiological distinctions.

Evidence from moral and political characteristics.

¹ M. Edwards, Lettre à Amed. Thierry.

cover still further evidence of the same fact both in their political combinations and their social institutions. The campaigns of Cæsar bring us successively into acquaintance with distinct confederacies existing in different parts of the country, with little intercourse between them. The first is that of the Arverni, Adui, Sequani, and other central and eastern tribes: beyond them the Belgica of Cæsar forms a separate cluster of nations, closely connected among themselves, but maintaining no political relations with their southern neighbours. The tribes of Normandy and Maine hang, as it were, loosely upon the skirts of the Belgians proper, and, though less intimately united with them, are easily induced to join in a common cause. The Armoricans, strictly attached to one another, are allied moreover with all the tribes on the northern coast, and seem to be no less closely linked with the fortunes of the Turones, Andi and others on the lower Loire. In short there exists a certain homogeneity throughout the whole Belgica of Strabo. Even to the south of the Loire it may be suspected that the Santones and Pictones belong to the same race with the communities to the north. The request of the Helvetians to the Sequani, to be permitted to fix themselves in the territory occupied by these tribes¹, seems to show that no strict bonds of blood or sentiment existed between the nations of the eastern and those of the western centre of Gaul.

The progress which civilization had made in the Additional

presumptions in its favour:
different character of Gaulish civilzation in the Gaelic and Kymric communities respectively.

northern and more southern parts of Gaul respectively, seems also to indicate the distinct and later development of the Kymric element of the population. At the time when the northern invaders were disputing the soil of Italy with the republic, they showed in one respect a striking

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 9, 10.

inferiority to opponents with whom they were so equally matched in the field. It marked the national aptitude of the Romans to imbibe the lessons of civilization, that from the first they regarded the city, with the ideas of freedom, sympathy and unity attaching to it, as the source or nucleus of political society. Hence arose the deep-set principles from which were unfolded their conceptions of civil government, of personal independence, of social rights and their correlative duties. But the feeling of citizenship, the moving principle of Greek and Roman life, had little power of spontaneous development among any races of Celtic origin. The natural ties which held society together among the Gauls were rather personal than civil. The Gaul devoted himself to the service of his chieftain, whether as a serf, a client, or a friend; the chieftains dwelt apart, and issued forth to war or council attended by a retinue of dependents, of whom they exacted a sort of feudal service in return for their maintenance.¹ A state of society of this kind gives room for the display of emulation and personal attachment, but it tends to isolate the elements of a nation rather than to concentrate them. The strength of the whole body was broken up by the petty factions and feuds which existed among its members; and while the courage of the Gauls was unsurpassed and their onset formidable from its impetuosity, they wanted those moral ties between man and man by which alone disasters can be borne and retrieved. Such was the general character of the Gaulish people; but in process of time their manners and principles of action had admitted of partial modification. When the Romans saw themselves at last arrayed front to front against the great powers of central Gaul, they found its political institutions in all the uncertainty and tremulousness of a period of transition. The increase of arts and commerce had collected masses of the population in cities; Bibracte, Noviodunum, Genabus, Vienna and Tolosa, were marts of commerce and strongholds of popular independence. The germs of municipal liberty had taken root in the bosom of the Gaelic states, and the influence of the chieftains of clans was gradually bowing before it. These states were, for the most part, governed by a chieftain exercising a nominal sovereignty, but elected and controlled by a popular assembly. The nobles struggled by artifice and intrigue to maintain a remnant of their authority, while the bolder and more ambitious of their class cherished schemes of aggrandisement and usurpation. Political power among the Gaelic tribes had fallen, for the most part, into the hands of the commonalty, but public virtue had withered almost before it blossomed; for the communities whose institutions were the most liberal, and condition the most advanced, were precisely those which submitted most readily to the Roman domination. But the northern or Kymric tribes were still subject to the primitive rule of their kings and chieftains; among them the lower classes were still merely serfs or clients. They possessed no great cities, no public marts of industry and commerce. The places which we find dignified by the names of towns, or oppida, were for the most part merely entrenched fastnesses on lofty eminences or in woody coverts, whither a whole tribe might retreat in case of attack with all its moveables and cattle¹;

¹ Compare the account of Orgetorix in Cæsar (B. G. i. 4.): “Omnem suam familiam, ad hominum millia decem, undique coegerit et omnes clientes obseratosque suos.”

¹ On this point there is much diversity of opinion. A writer in the Mém. Soc. Antiq. de France argues,—1. That the term civitas, when applied to the Gaulish barbarians by Cæsar, never means a city, but always a state: 2. That the designation of urbs is used only two or three times; of Avaricum, B. G. vi. 9., vii. 15.; of Gergovia, vii. 36.; of Alesia, vii. 68.: 3. That oppidum (Strab. φρούριον) is but in the intervals of peace the people dwelt in hamlets or detached habitations, in the situations most convenient for fishing, hunting, or husbandry.¹ That the oppida were not intended for permanent residence appears clearly in the case of the Arinoricans, at least, from their position on the rockiest and most remote peninsulas.

The religious ideas prevalent among the Gauls may furnish us with another clue to the distinction between their several races. The theological system known to us by the name of Druidism, from the appellation of its priests, was claimed by the Kymry of Britain as their own invention.² Without attaching any credit to this assertion in its literal meaning, it may nevertheless be taken to represent the fact that Druidism was pre-always a place of refuge and defence merely. He urges that Cæsar's description of the oppida implies that they were almost empty spaces; large armies manœuvred in them, as at Avaricum 40,000 Gauls assembled "in foro et locis patentioribus," vii. 28. In the oppidum of Vesontio Cæsar's officers dwelt in tents, i. 39. Critognatus speaks of it as a great calamity, that on the invasion of the Cimbri the Gauls were compelled to resort to their oppida, vii. 77. When Gaul was conquered, one of the means taken to break the people to servitude was to compel them to inhabit their oppida by seizing their lands: "compulsos in oppida multatis agris," vii. 54. He asserts that in the ancient Celtic languages, the Low-Breton for instance, there is no word for a city in our sense. The assemblies of the people were held not in cities, but in the open air, at the common frontiers of several nations, vi. 13. So religious ceremonies were performed in forests and on mountains, &c. The argument is pushed too far, and should be confined at least to the northern parts of the country; but Walckenaer (Géogr. des Gaules) is, I think, too sweeping in his rejection of it.

Different character of Druidism among the Kymry and the Gael.

¹ The Gauls built their scattered dwellings principally in the woods and on the banks of streams; "aestus vitandi causa." They were made of the branches of trees and clay (Cæs. B.G. vi. 30.), and thatched with straw (Vitruv. i. 1.); only a ground floor, as appears from the absence of any word in the old Celtic to signify stage or story. Accordingly, there exists no remains of domestic buildings of the Celts in Gaul.

² Cæs. B.G. vi. 13.: "Disciplina in Britannia reperta atque inde in Galliam translata esse existimatur: et nunc, qui diligentius eam rem cognoscere volunt, plerumque illic discendi causa proficiscuntur."

served in its purest and most systematic form in our own island; the express statement of Cæsar is sufficient to prove that the highest instruction in its mysteries flowed from thence, and that its votaries were wont to flock thither to imbibe its most spiritual lore. The great religious assembly of the whole of Gaul was held in the territory of the Carnutes, north of the Loire.¹ It was in the northern and western parts of the country that the Druids seem to have exercised the greatest influence in political affairs; it was there that they continued to animate successive revolts against Rome, till they drew down an inveterate persecution upon themselves and their religion. In those regions also the most important and most numerous remains of Druidical worship still exist and support the inference that it was among the Kymry in Gaul as well as in Britain that the oldest and purest form of Druidism flourished. The character of the system was essentially Oriental, and forms another link in the chain which connects the Kymry of the West with the Cimmerii of the Euxine shores², and through them with the primitive hives of Asia. It corresponded in many important particulars with the simple and comparatively spiritual character of the Persian theosophy; it taught the purity of the Godhead as a metaphysical abstraction, and the eternity of the soul's existence by transmigration³; it had its mysteries and initiatory rites, by

¹ The spot is said to have been at Dreux. (Mœbe in Cæs. l. c.) Cæsar states that the Gauls considered this region the centre of their country, which might be nearly true of the Kymric confederacies. There are legends, I have been informed, connected with the cathedral of Chartres, which tend to show that this place was selected for a centre of Christian missions from its reputed sanctity under the Druids.

² Diodor. Sic. v. 32.

³ There seems no reason to suppose that the Druidical dogma maintained, like that of Pythagoras, the transmigration of the human soul into the bodies of animals. See Diodor. v. 28. It is not quite certain even that Cæsar represents the soul as passing from one which the mind of the votary was withdrawn from the contemplation of the manifold energies of the God-head to that of his essential unity; it abounded in symbols, inculcated retirement and meditation, and upheld the character of its priesthood as mediators between earth and heaven: again, it made use of natural phenomena as means to elevate the mind to the comprehension of a first cause, glided from thence into the frivolous delusions of astrology, and finally degenerated into the impieties and horrors of belief in magic.¹ Hence its addiction to human sacrifices², the last resort of superstitious terror endeavouring to extort the secrets of futurity from a reluctant power, and to control the course of destiny. But by the side of this Oriental theism there existed another system, much less distinctive in its character, an elemental worship of the grossest kind, in which the objects of nature were identified with the memory of deceased heroes, and the sun and stars, the thunder and the whirlwind, were worshipped as the visible representatives of superior beings. The Roman sceptic was surprised to find the barbarians adoring, as he supposed, the same divinities whom his own critical acuteness had rejected. Jupiter and Apollo, and the rest of the host of Olympus, were recognized in the consistory of the Gallic deities: Mercurius seemed to hold the highest place among them, under the name of Teutates, and was venerated as the patron of all their civilization; the sun, or Apollo, was worshipped by the name of Belenus; Taranis represented the human body into another (vi. 14.): Lucan (i. 460.) and Mela (iii. 2.) only assert a belief in its immortality, implying the existence of a future state. See an essay by Chiniac de la Bastide, in Leber, Coll. de Pièces relatives à l'Histoire de France, p. iii.

¹ Cæs. B. G. vi. 14.; Plin. H.N. xxx. 4.: "Britannia hodieque eam (magiam) attonitè celebrat, tantis cærimoniiis, ut dedisse Persis videri possit." Compare Clem. Alex. Strom. i. 71.; Ammian. xv. 9.; Mel. iii. 2.

² Diodor. Sic. v. 31.; Strab. iv. 4.; Cæs. B.G. vi. 16.

thunderer Jupiter; and Hesus was their Mars, the god of battles.¹ We may ascribe the worship of Belenus and Teutates to the traditions imported into Gaul by the Phœnicians.² The Greek colonists of the coast may also have had their share in moulding the western polytheism to the shape of the eastern; but it must still remain a question how far this form of heathenism was independent of Druidism³, and how far, on the other hand, it was a degeneration from that more spiritual system, in accordance with the sensual tendencies of the period and the people. But if the councils and institutions of the Gaelic nations were more independent of Druidical influence, it must have exerted a vigorous ascendancy over the lower classes, and taken deep root in the remoter and less frequented districts. In the north-western angle ^{Existing monuments of Druidism in Gaul.} of Gaul, comprised between the lower Loire and Seine, the region in which the Kymry seem to have been most unmixed, there exist at the present day about ninety remains of Celtic monuments, all probably of religious significance. They abound equally on the rocky coasts of Brittany, and the wooded hills of Normandy, in the meadows of Anjou, and the plains of the Orleanois.⁴ In central and eastern Gaul similar remains are confined to the highlands about the sources of the Seine, the Loire, the Allier and the Vienne. Within those narrow limits about fifty such may be enumerated. But in the lowlands of the ¹ Cæs. B.G. vi. 17.; Luc. i. 445.

² The Phœnician origin of the worship of Teutates (Theuth) is confirmed by that of a Mercurius in Spain. (Liv. xxvi. 44.) Belenus is connected with Baal. Teutates may still be recognised in many local names in England.

³ This hypothesis is maintained by Thierry, who considers Druidism to have been only adopted by the Gael at a later period. (Gaulois, II. i.)

⁴ These enumerations are made from Hocquart's Carte Archéologique de la France. These various monuments are almost universally cromlechs, dolmens, or rocking-stones.

Gaelic territory they either never existed or have been altogether obliterated. Throughout the Province not more than one or two vestiges of the kind can be traced. Here perhaps they were most ruthlessly exterminated by the arm of Roman persecution. Their number is also very small in the north-eastern or Belgic provinces of France; and there too they were trodden into the soil by the heel of the Roman legionary, quartered for centuries in the neighbourhood of the German frontier, or were worn away by the attrition of succeeding waves of invaders, the Sueve, the Frank and the Burgundian. In Aquitania the presence of the Celt is attested by only one or two monuments of his religion, and the antiquity of these may possibly remount to the earliest period of Gaulish history. But in the district between the Gironde and the lower Loire they are hardly less numerous than in Brittany and Maine, and are there scattered indiscriminately over hill, plain and valley, in token of the general diffusion and security of the worship which they subserved.

IV. The Rhine, which formed the geographical boundary between Gaul and Germany, was never a barrier capable of restraining the migratory propensities of the northern races, or preventing the repeated transit of invaders from the right to the left bank. Accordingly, the Kymric population, which had spread over the northern region of Gaul, was constantly harassed by the Teutonic hordes, which pressed hungrily on its rear. The Germans, who had introduced themselves within the limits of Gaul, were already, in the time of Cæsar, intermixed in a great degree with the earlier possessors, besides retaining, in some localities, their own names and characteristics. Such were the Eburones, Treviri and Nervii, the Segni, Cæresi and Pæmani, who dwelt apart from the Kymry, with distinct habits and institutions. But it is to the whole of this population, thus fused and intermingled, that Cæsar applies the name of Belgæ; a name, however, which can be shown not to be properly generic, but to be appropriated in strictness, like that of Celt originally, to certain particular tribes.¹ We have already noticed some traces of subdivision among the great Kymric race, and the boundary between the pure and the mixed Kymry may be placed on the line of the Seine and Marne. We may readily believe that this mixed people had lost much of the genuine manners, language, and religion of its Celtic ancestors; and this may account for the paucity of its sacerdotal monuments, as well as for the difference which Cæsar so strongly marks between its language and that of the Gael. But he is undoubtedly mistaken in his assertion that the Belgians were for the most part of German origin, their essential identity with the Celts being sufficiently established by the declarations of Posidonius and Strabo, together with the strong presumptions that have been adduced from physiological and other evidence.

IV. The Belgians a Celtic people, with an intermixture of Teutonic tribes.

This people, however, as it was the last to emerge from the rudeness of its primeval forests, and was unable to shake off from its bosom the unmixed barbarism of a still younger race clinging so closely about it, so it was much behind the rest of the Gaulish population in all the elements of civilized existence. Throughout the extensive region which it occupied we hear of no place deserving the name of a city, except perhaps Samarobriva, the modern Amiens, the bridge over the Somme. The Morini and Menapii fed entirely on fish and the eggs of wild fowl; they dwelt in the recesses of their woods and morasses, with no more sense of cleanliness and comfort than the

Their character and mode of life.

¹ Thierry, Gaulois, Introd. lvii.

Teutonic Eburones and Nervii. The Belgians were noted for the use of the scythed chariot¹, one of the rudest and earliest implements of war. They rejoiced in passing their whole lives with arms in their hands. The German tribes haughtily excluded from their territory the purveyors of all foreign articles, whether of use or luxury. Accustomed to constant warfare with a more savage and ferocious race than themselves, the Belgians acquired a renown for bravery beyond all the other inhabitants of Gaul.² They affected to despise their brethren in the south, kept aloof from their confederacies, and were even inclined to disown their kinship.

The limits of the Belgian conquest are broadly defined by the two great rivers which have been mentioned; but it is probable that some of these tribes penetrated far into the south. The Volcæ, who occupied a district between the Rhone and the Pyrenees, in two divisions distinguished by the names of Arecomici and Tectosages, are connected with the Belgians by the co-ordinate appellation of Bolgæ, and even of Belgæ.³ The fate of Britain was similar to that of Gaul. There also the conquering Kymry found the Belgians at their back before they had well time to turn themselves round in the habitations of the vanquished Gael. There, too, the new comers brought along with them a portion of Teutonic blood; and the south-eastern angle of the island,

Some of their tribes penetrated into the south of Gaul.

¹ Lucan, i. 426.:

“ Et docilis rector rostrati Belga covini.”

Thierry attributes the scythed chariot to the Treviri, but I question whether the Germans ever used it. Mela iii. 6. says: “ Bigis et curribus, covinos vocant, Gallicè armati.” Covinus appears to be a Celtic word, common both to the Kymric and Gaelic variety. Cæsar, however, makes no mention of scythed chariots among the Gauls or Britons. (Cluver. Germ. Ant. i. 335.)

² Cæs. B. G. i. 1.; Ammian. xv. 11.

³ Thierry, Gaulois, Introd. p. li.—lv.

the limit of their progress, came to be inhabited by a mixed people, who seemed to superficial observers to have little in common with the race upon whom they had intruded themselves.

But, notwithstanding the familiar intercourse thus established between the Celtic and Teutonic tribes who shared the north-east of Gaul, the enmity between the two races continued unabated, the Germans hovering on the banks of the Rhine with numbers and courage daily augmenting, the Gauls crouching in terror before an enemy whom they dared not encounter, or even inviting him within their frontiers to fight their battles for them. The time had long passed since the Gauls had been an emigrating and a conquering people.¹ Their incursions into the German territories had once been no less numerous and successful than those by which they had possessed themselves of one half of Italy, and devastated nearly the whole. But step by step they had been hurled back in both quarters by nations fiercer or better disciplined than themselves. The progress of moral and physical culture among them had taken a direction which paralysed their means of defence both against the Germans and the Romans. It enervated their bodies and subdued their daring courage, as compared with the wild barbarians of the north, while it had no tendency to impart that community of sentiment and identity of purpose, which hold the scales of victory so evenly between civilized powers.

The ancient writers abound in descriptions of the character of a nation which performed so conspicuous a part in the early history of Europe. In stature the Gauls are uniformly represented as exceeding the people of Greece and Italy. Undoubtedly the disproportion between the Italians and the Kymry was strongly marked; and the Senones, from whom the Romans derived their most formidable conceptions of the Gaulish warriors, as well as the Cispadanes generally, were of the Kymric race. The lightness of complexion ascribed to the nation was also characteristic of the northern rather than of the southern population. It may be conjectured that a change of habits and perhaps of climate has embrowned a skin which paled under the shadow of primeval forests¹; yet even now the darkest-haired Gael has not the olive tint of the Italian and Greek. The temper of the Gauls in general was lively, frivolous and irascible, inconstant even to perfidy, violent in language and gesture²; their courage was daring and impetuous, but not capable of enduring resistance and reverses.³ At the same time they were noted for simplicity and good-humour, and rushed gaily into danger without artifice or malice. But their great defect was the want of patience and true earnestness, and of the moral firmness which controls a prejudice and refrains from a gratification for the sake of an ulterior result. Their want of self-control and self-respect was manifested in the brutal sensuality to which they were addicted. It may be surmised that the worst of their vices were confined for the most part to those

General character of the Gauls.

¹ Tac. Germ. 29. : "Validiores olim Gallorum res fuisse summus auctorum divus Julius tradit, eoque credibile est etiam Gallos in Germaniam transgressos." Comp. Cæs. B. G. vi. 24.

¹ Arnold, Hist. of Rome, i. 529.

² The spirit of bravado for which the Gauls were remarkable (ἀπειληταὶ δὲ καὶ ἀνατατικοὶ καὶ τεραγωδημένοι ὑπάρχουσι. Diod. Sic. v. 31.) is aptly illustrated by the reply of their chieftains to the vain-glorious question of Alexander the Great. After exhibiting before them a great display of his magnificence and power, he ended by demanding of them, What was the thing in the world they were most afraid of? "We fear nothing," they replied, "except it be lest the sky fall." Strab. vii. 3.; compare Posid. ap. Athen. iv. 40.; Ælian. xii. 23.

³ Tac. Agric. 11., comparing the Gauls and Britons, says of both: "In depositis periculis eadem audacia, et ubi advencere, in detractandis eadem formido."

who came in contact with the sickly refinement of the Greek settlers; but even the over-civilized nations of the South affected disgust at their enormity. The Gauls exhibited docility in learning and considerable aptitude for practical avocations. They carried on a commerce in various articles of manufacture; and, though their coinage was rude in execution, we know that the art of working metals was in extensive use among them. They were acute in intellect, and curious in speculation, though they never produced a spontaneous literature. But their intercourse with Rome gave a new stimulus to their genius; and under the empire the cities of Gaul were hardly second to any as seats of learning and schools of rhetoric.

The spirit of careless exaggeration, which was wont ^{Population of Gaul.} to regard the desert region of the north as the teeming parent of innumerable nations, has vanished before the calculations of experience and reason; and it will be readily allowed that at least one half of Gaul was occupied in the time of Cæsar by unsettled and scanty tribes, who abandoned a vast proportion of their territory to the barrenness of nature, while in the remnant which they professed to cultivate they barely scratched the soil. If the numbers of their fighting men are represented as enormous, we must remember that war was the only occupation of the people of the north, and that at least a fourth of each nation was ready at any moment to start up in arms.¹ In the south the manners of the people approached much nearer to those of civilized life, and the richness of the soil was developed by a due application of labour. A calculation of the entire population has been made for the period of the fourth century of our era upon grounds which apparently deserve confidence, and the result gives a total amount of ten millions and a half.¹ At that period the country had been for some time exposed to the ravages of barbarian invasion, and the growth of the population had doubtless been checked by a long term of misgovernment. Nevertheless, it would be preposterous to suppose that the semi-barbarous Gauls of Cæsar's age approached at all nearly to that number. Cæsar himself boasted, as we learn from Plutarch², that he had combated three millions of men; and in this round number we may conjecture, that he meant to comprehend the whole male population of the hostile states. If, on the one hand, the tribes of Germans and Britons whom Cæsar met in the field are to be deducted from this calculation, we have to add the inhabitants of the Province, on the other, in order to obtain the number of the whole Gaulish people, which we may fairly conclude to have reached about six millions at the date of his invasion.

¹ When the whole mass of the Helvetic tribes migrated to the amount of 368,000 souls, 92,000 men were capable of bearing arms. Cæs. B.C. i. 29. Cæsar assures us that he saw the precise data from which this enumeration was made. In the Pannonian revolt the total number of insurgent tribes is stated generally at 800,000, that of the warriors at 200,000. Vel. ii. 110.

¹ Dureau de la Malle, Econ. Pol. des Romains, i. 301.; Duruy, Hist. des Romains, ii. 409.

² Plut. Cæs. 15., who, however, evidently interprets the statement literally.

CHAPTER VI.

The Suevi enter Gaul, and establish themselves in the territory of the Sequani.—The Alliance of the Republic solicited by both the Gauls and Germans.—Movement among the Helvetii: they threaten to enter the Roman Province: Caesar leaves Rome, and assumes his command in Gaul: Repels the invasion of the Helvetii: Follows them into the territory of the Aedui: Defeats and compels them to return to their own country.—Caesar advances against the Suevi: Negotiates with their King Ariovistus: Obtains a complete victory, and expels the Germans from Gaul.—Caesar's first campaign, A.U. 696. B.C. 58.

At the period at which we have now arrived in the contest between the Gauls and Romans

The Germans on the Rhine: a third power comes into action, one of the Suevi.

which we have already caught indistinct glimpses, but which, from this time forward, is destined to be seldom long removed from our observation. The independence of northern and central Gaul is now threatened, not only by the crafty ambition of the South, but more directly by impetuous assaults from the opposite quarter also. The banks of the Rhine were tinged with a deeper shade of barbarism than the countries that lay further to the west. On the left, several offshoots, as we have seen, from the Teutonic family were already settled. It was only within a late period that these immigrations had taken place, and the stream of German invasion still continued to pour in at intervals. The Suevi, a very formidable clan, were now hovering on the right bank, impatiently awaiting an opportunity of following the steps of their predecessors. These savage warriors were unacquainted even with the rudiments of civilized life.¹ Their polity was simply the military supremacy of the strongest and bravest. They neither built towns nor cultivated land, but dwelt in temporary encampments, sleeping under the branches of trees or in the open air, using their forests and mountains as places of security, and wherever they were unconfined by the pressure of their neighbours, moving periodically from spot to spot in restless migration. But their enterprises were undertaken rather for plunder than with a view to a permanent change of abode, and they were not in the habit of going forth to war with their wives and children, betraying in that, as in other respects, a want of definite purpose which marks the lowest scale in human progress.

In the year of Rome 693 the forces of Ariovistus, the king of the Suevic nation, were standing on the German side of the middle Rhine, ready to obey the first invitation to cross it.² They formed a compact body of warriors, fifteen thousand strong, unencumbered with baggage or followers, accustomed to a life of ceaseless activity, and despising every appliance of luxury or

Menacing attitude of the Suevi.
A. U. 693.
B. C. 61.

¹ Some figures on the column of Trajan (see Fabretti, Columna Trajana, p. 16.) represent the mode of wearing the hair adopted by this people and their kindred tribes, as described by Tacitus (Germ. 38.): “Insigne gentis oblique crinem nodoque substringere . . . apud Suevos horrentem capillum retro sequuntur.” The front hair is gathered back in a large knot or ball on the top of the forehead.

² The date of the irruption of the Suevi is not fixed by the authorities. A passage in Ariovistus's reply to Cæsar, B.G. i. 44.: “Neque bello Allobrogum proximo Æduos Romanis auxilium tulisse,” has been supposed to refer to the campaign against the Helvetti on the frontier of the Allobroges, A.U. 696. But in the first place, the Allobroges took no part in that war; and, again, the Ædui in their prostrate condition could not have given any assistance. The war, therefore, with the Allobroges must have been that of the year 692, and must have taken place before the Ædui were menaced by the Suevi and their allies. Accordingly, the date of the arrival of the Germans cannot be placed earlier than 693, nor the reception of Divitiacus at Rome before the end of that year.

comfort. In the disturbed state of the interior of Gaul at that moment, such a summons could not long be wanting. The Ædui had taken advantage of their commanding position to oppress the neighbouring states.

*Ascendancy of the Ædui in Central Gaul.* Their rivals, the Arverni, had been considerably weakened by their contests with the Romans, and their influence, founded upon fear rather than favour, had dwindled away as rapidly as their power. The latter had been suffering also from intestine divisions, one of their nobility, named Celtillus, having attempted to usurp supreme authority among them.¹ On the other hand, the Ædui had been received into strict alliance with the Romans upon terms of professed equality. They were proud to be acknowledged as the friends and brothers of the illustrious conquerors; but the levity of the Gaulish character was marked by their perversely holding aloof from them, when their aid might have been expected against the revolt of the Allobroges.² They wished perhaps to display their independence in the presence of the Gauls around them, who doubtless observed with jealousy the favour in which they were held by the Romans. But the republic was deeply offended, and soon found an occasion for showing its resentment.

The Sequani complain of their tyranny. The Sequani complained bitterly of the tyranny of the Ædui, who had imposed heavy tolls on the navigation of the Saone, the common highway for the commerce of both nations with the Province and the coasts of the Mediterranean.³ When these exactions became no longer tolerable, the injured people determined to shake them off by an appeal to arms. The Arverni also were easily induced to unite in a confederacy against their ancient rivals; but to rise against the Ædui was to brave at the same time the displeasure of the Romans, to give a pretext at least to the southern invader for interfering with the affairs of central Gaul. To secure themselves from danger in this quarter the allies determined to give the Suevi an interest in their defence. The resources of the German tribe were undefined and unknown, but their proximity was imminent, the terror of their name was great, and their neighbours made the fatal mistake of fancying that they could counterbalance the hostility of Rome.

¹ Cæs. B.G. vii. 4.

² Cæs. B.G. i. 44. See above.

³ Strab. iv. 3.

Accordingly, Arioistus and his warriors were invited within the Gaulish territory, and they readily set their feet upon the soil of the Sequani. The Romans at the moment were so much occupied with domestic perils that they could pay no attention to this important movement.

They invite the Suevi to their assistance, throw off the yoke of the Ædui, and assume the leadership of the Gaelic tribes

Possibly the Ædui, conscious of their own recent treachery, were ashamed to call upon their allies for aid; perhaps the republic was well pleased to leave them for once to fight their own battle upon unequal terms. The contest quickly terminated in their complete discomfiture, and the conditions which they were compelled to accept were highly disadvantageous and disgraceful.¹ They surrendered the children of their nobility to the Sequani as hostages, and swore never to wage war for their recovery, never to solicit the succour of the Romans, or to withhold such respect and submissive behaviour towards their triumphant enemy as are due from the client to his patron. The Sequani affected to seize the honourable pre-eminence from which the Ædui had thus fallen, and claimed the leadership of the tribes in that part of Gaul.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 31.: "Cum his Æduos corumque clientes scindatque iterum armis contendisse, magnam calamitatem pulsos acceptisse, omnem nobilitatem, omnem senatum, omnem equitatum amisisse."

Divitiacus the Æduan solicits the assistance of
the Romans.

Among the Ædui, the chief magistrate, or vergobret, had no power to resist the national will, of which he was no more than the interpreter and organ.¹ But Divitiacus, who occupied that station, felt acutely the dishonour of his countrymen, and refused to submit in his own person to the terms in which the multitude acquiesced. He escaped with difficulty beyond the frontiers, and took refuge in Rome, where he hoped to obtain the succour of the republic for the recovery of the honour and influence of his nation. Gaul could have sent no man more fit by his intellectual cultivation to command for her the respect and sympathy of a civilized people. Divitiacus belonged to the Druidical caste, and was well versed in all the lore it boasted. As an expounder of the mysteries which already attracted the curiosity of the Roman sages, his society was peculiarly agreeable to Cicero, who has enshrined in his immortal pages the memory of their friendly intercourse.² The recommendation of so illustrious a patron secured for the wanderer of the north more than ordinary respect. When he appeared in the senate to plead the cause of his countrymen, the allies and brothers of the republic, he was requested to take his seat among the assembled nobles. But this honour he modestly declined, and delivered his address leaning on his shield.³ Cæsar, who took an interest in every object of human science, no less than in the affairs of state to which he had been regularly trained, engaged in an intimacy with the Gaulish chieftain, which forms one of the most pleasing features in his life and character for its tenderness and fidelity. From conversation with Divitiacus, who became his constant companion in his Gallic campaigns, he derived, we may suppose, much of the acquaintance he manifests with the history and institutions of his adversaries. But, in the meanwhile, the simplicity of the Æduan's character was not proof against the seductions of Roman refinement. He evidently became a convert to the views and sentiments of the conquering nation; in his admiration for the arts and sciences which flourished in the metropolis of the South he gradually forgot the ruder virtues of his own countrymen; and he familiarized himself with the fatal idea that a foreign dominion might exalt and enoble the people whom it enslaved.

¹ Cæsar terms this magistrate vergobretus, which Celtic scholars derive from the words ver-go-breith ("homme de jugement," O'Brien, Thierry). He was elected by a council of priests and nobles, and had the power of life and death. But his office was only annual (B.G. i. 16.), and a second of the same family could not hold it during the lifetime of a previous occupant. (B.G. vii. 33.)

² Cic. de Divin. i. 41.

³ The story is recorded by Eumenius, a native of Autun, and we may conjecture that it was preserved traditionally among the Ædui (Gratiar. Act. Constant. 3.): "Princeps Æduus in senatum venit, rem docuit, cum quidem oblato concessu minus sibi vindicasset quam

But, however well individuals might be pleased to display their magnanimity and urbanity before the eyes of an admiring stranger, the government had too many anxious cares pressing upon it to decide at once the tenor of its Gallic policy. The Allobroges had just been subjugated, but their resistance had cost blood and treasure; moreover, the Ædui had done nothing for their allies towards hastening the termination of the struggle. Meanwhile, the course of affairs in the city was evidently leading to the entire subjection of the republic to the will of an odious triumvirate, and whichever of the three chiefs should claim the conduct of a new war would acquire thereby a fearful pre-eminence. As far, therefore, as the senate was concerned, the solicitations of Divitiacus fell upon dabatur, scuto innixus peroravit." Livy (xxxviii. 21.) describes the Gaulish shield as a long, narrow, and flat plank: " Scuta longa, cæterum ad amplitudinem corporum parum lata, et ea ipsa plana, male tegebant Gallos." unwilling ears. Moreover, Ariovistus, on his part, had not been idle. He also solicited an alliance with the Roman people; and his representations, backed as they were by so powerful a force quartered almost on the frontier of their possessions, were not without effect. Anxious to avoid war at any price, the senate temporised, and encouraged the German to make his appearance in person.¹ While Divitiacus was still at Rome, the government bestowed upon his rival the titles of friend and ally, and presented him with magnificent tokens of its regard.² If the senate could have had its own way, it would have continued to balance the two parties one against the other, and tried by these means to prevent aggression

Ariovistus, king of the Suevi, negotiates with Rome.

The republic determines to take the side of the Ædui.

on either side. But it was with the people, after all, that the determination of the matter really lay; and when they insisted, shortly afterwards, upon the appointment of Cæsar to his Gallic command, with such extensive and permanent powers, it was a distinct declaration of the national will in favour of a decisive and warlike policy beyond the Alps. This declaration, however, was not made till the progress of events called more imperatively for Roman interference, and Cæsar's position was such as enabled him to take the conduct of it.

The Suevi, on their part, became enamoured of the charms of their new habitation, its climate, fertility, and cultivation. Not less than one third part of the territory of the Sequani had been surrendered to them, and as it was too extensive for their own occupation, they introduced fresh hordes of their countrymen into it, till their force amounted to one hundred and twenty thousand warriors.¹ The Sequani, insulted and harassed, fled from their villages and betook themselves to their places of defence, while the Ædui, suffering probably still greater oppression, rose in arms against the savage intruders. But Ariovistus was not to be easily dislodged. According to the practice of his countrymen he fortified himself on a morass on the upper Saone, and commanded the country from his inaccessible fastness. Secure in his position, he repeated and increased his demands, requiring another third part of the territory of his hosts, in order to settle there a new colony of Harudes from beyond the Rhine. He interposed to prevent any restoration of hostages between the rival nations, whose mutual animosity he strove by all means to foster for his own purposes, while, as far as his power extended, his rapacity and cruelty raged unchecked.

¹ Plut. Cæs. 19.: Καίτοι τὸν Βασιλέα πρότερον αὐτῶν Ἀριοβίστον ἐν Πράμη σύμμαχον πεποιημένος.

² Cæs. B. G. i. 43.: "Rex appellatus a senatu et amicus, munera amplissima missa."

The growing resistance of the neighbouring nations was suddenly checked by one of those periodical migrations which were wont to spread confusion throughout the whole land. The Helvetii, who inhabited a great part of modern Switzerland, had grown impatient of the narrow limits in which they were crowded together, and harassed at the same time by the encroachments of the advancing German tide.² The Alps and Jura formed barriers to their diffusion on the south and west, and the population thus confined outgrew the scanty means of support afforded

Restlessness of the Helvetii :
they resolve to make a general emigration into Gaul.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 31.

² The account which was commonly given of this people and their migration is that they were a pastoral tribe, abounding in wealth and of a peaceful disposition; it was the example of the Cimbri and Teutones, with whom they came in contact, that corrupted their natural simplicity, and suggested visions of conquest and rapine. Strab. vii. 2., following Posidonius. But Cæsar says they were the bravest of the Gauls, from their constant warfare with the Germans on their frontier. Cæs. B.G. i. 1.

by its mountain valleys. One swarm had indeed separated from the main body not many years before, uniting itself with the Cimbri and Teutones, and penetrating into Gaul by the northern outlet of their territory. But the German tribes, whose increasing numbers had closed against them the old Gaulish route to the east of Europe, had now settled themselves on the left bank of the Rhine also; and the Helvetii, who felt some contempt perhaps for their Gallic neighbours, were the less disposed to assail an enemy so formidable as the Suevi, and at the same time so poor. The western outlet, therefore, where the Rhone rushes out of the lake of Geneva and threads a narrow defile on its way into France, was the point to which their eyes were directed. Divided into a number of small cantons, they owned the supremacy of no single chieftain; but one, by name Orgetorix, possessed at this time the principal influence among them, and was ambitious of placing himself at their head. His suggestion that the entire nation should transplant itself to a foreign soil was received with universal approbation. He proposed that they should march in one mass into the heart of Gaul, promised them an easy victory over the most martial and powerful of its opponents, and dominion over the whole Gaulish people. He hoped to rise himself to undisputed supremacy among his own countrymen, and through them to rule over the whole breadth of the land from the Alps to the ocean.¹

This enterprise, extravagant as it may appear, was no more than what the Cimbri might in all probability have accomplished, had they kept it steadily in view, and at a later period it was not the mere dream of a visionary. Orgetorix did not look to the employment of arms

Orgetorix, his intrigues and sudden death.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 2.; Dion, xxxviii. 31.; Plut. Cæs. 18.

only, however much he relied upon his countrymen's fancied superiority in war. He was well acquainted with the state of central Gaul, and the political jealousies which constituted its weakness. To secure aid and encouragement he intrigued with ambitious chieftains among the Ædui and Sequani. Dumnorix, the brother of Divitiacus, who had succeeded him in the office of *vergobret*¹, and was anxious to extend the authority and duration of his office, was won over by the crafty Helvetian by promises of assistance and the bribe of his daughter in marriage. Casticus, the son of Catamantaledes, late king of the Sequani, had failed in obtaining the succession upon his father's death, and was burning with indignation at the affront. To him also similar views of aggrandisement were opened, and his co-operation promptly secured. But while these plans were ripening, the Helvetii began to suspect the personal views which their champion was harbouring under the semblance of zeal for the public good. Orgetorix was summoned to appear before the popular assembly, and challenged to defend himself against the charge of aspiring to the tyranny. According to the custom of the barbarians, who seem never to have contemplated the possible innocence of an accused party, he was to plead his cause in chains, and, if unsuccessful, the penalty was death by fire. The culprit accepted the conditions, and the day was appointed: in the interval, however, he collected all his friends and dependants to the number of ten thousand, and effected his escape. The nation flew to arms to recover the person of the fugitive, but his sudden death arrested their indignation. Disappointment and despair, it was rumoured, had driven the guilty intriguer to put an end to his existence.

¹ It has been mentioned already, on the authority of Cæsar (B.G. vii. 33.), that it was illegal for a second personage of the same family to hold this or any other political office during the lifetime of the prior occupant. If this statement is correct, it would seem that Dumnorix, who was a popular favourite, had already succeeded in getting the law relaxed in his behalf.

The loss, however, of their principal adviser ^{Preparation^s of the Helvetii.}

duced no change in the counsels of the Helvetians. They sought no alliance with discontented chieftains in the neighbouring states, but, confident in their unassisted strength, determined calmly to abandon their homes, and trust to their own fortune and valour to find themselves, with their women and children, a more desirable residence elsewhere. They devoted the next two years to making the necessary preparations, and to collecting a sufficient store of provisions. The third was destined for the expedition itself. Meanwhile, they extended their design by embracing in their league the Rauraci, the Tulingi¹ and the Latobrigi. The next point to be decided regarded the precise course which they should take. Two routes might conduct them west-

A. U. 696.
B. C. 58.
Choice between two routes into Gaul.

ward into Gaul : the one following the defile of the Rhone along the north bank of that river, and thus penetrating into the country of the Sequani ; the other lying to the south, and crossing the territory of the Allobroges in the direction of the province.² The nature of the country rendered the first of these routes peculiarly hazardous. For many miles the mountains descend almost perpendicularly into the torrent below. Modern engineers have succeeded in making a path along the brow of these cliffs ; but the ease with which the traveller now winds round their projecting precipices, and above the most tremendous abysses, serves to enhance his conception of the perils which must have attended a march among them before these obstacles were overcome. The emigrants soon decided that this route was impracticable in the face of an enemy. The other alternative offered a passage, the difficulties of which might not be insurmountable. The Rhone might be crossed either by the bridge, which already existed at Geneva¹, the frontier town of the Allobroges, in possession at this period of a Roman garrison, or, if this was closed against them, the stream presented fords which might be used by bold men accustomed to stem the torrents of the mountains.² The Helvetii determined to force their way through the country of the Allobroges, and to trust either to arms or persuasion to obtain a passage through the province and across the Rhone into the centre of Gaul. They indulged a hope that the people of the country would be eager, from their known hostility to the Romans, to afford every facility to a transient invader. But the favourable moment had passed ; the decisive victory of Pomptinus had cowed the spirit of the Allobroges, and their territory, in the language of the republic, was already pacified.³

¹ Augusta Rauracorum is the modern Bâle. The position of the Tulingi is quite uncertain, as they are not mentioned elsewhere. See Thierry, Gallois, II. v. ; Le Déist, César, ind. in voc ; Cæsar, ed. Lemaire. Stuhlingen is on the German side of the Rhine near Schaffhausen. Walckenaer places the Latobrigi at Breggen, near the sources of the Danube (ii. 272.). Tacitus, it will be remembered, extends the territory of the Helvetii to the Hercynian forest (Germ. 28.).

² Cæsar, B.G. i. 6.

We have seen that Cæsar, on the expiration of his consulship, obtained the government of the two Gauls, together with Illyricum, and that the people were so strongly impressed with the military importance of these provinces in the impending crisis, as to confer

Cæsar lingers in the neighbour-hood of Rome, in the beginning of the year.

¹ Cæs. I.c. It has been alleged that the name of this place does not occur again for a period of four hundred years; but inscriptions have been found there which sufficiently prove that it was a place of importance under the Romans Walckenaer, Géogr. des Gaules, i. 263.

² Cæs. I.c. : " Nonnullis locis vado transitur."

³ Cic. de Prov. Cons. 13.; Cæs. I.c. : " Allobroges qui nuper pacati erant."

the command upon him for a term of five years. The movements already meditated by their barbarian foes were not yet quite ripe for execution. The proconsul was content to watch them from a distance during the first months of the year. The prosecution of his own political schemes still required his proximity to Rome; he was engaged in abetting the revolutionary proceedings of the popular tribune; and he overawed the deliberations of the nobles by fixing his camp before the gates of the city, at the same time that he communicated with his lieutenants beyond the Alps, and kept a vigilant eye upon the movements of the Helvetic tribes. The course of three months witnessed the success of all his schemes. Domitius and Memmius, in the interest of the nobles, compelled him to defend the acts of his consulship before the hostile tribunal of the senate, from which, however, he extorted their entire ratification.¹ The triumph of Clodius over the nobility was also completely effected in this short interval. Cicero, who had refused to accept the proconsul's protection, was on the point of flying from the vengeance of his enemy.² The power of the triumvirate was established upon an unassailable basis, while Cæsar had secured by the marriage of his daughter an ascendancy in the counsels of his rival Pompeius.

Cæsar hastily leaves Italy, and reaches his army on the Rhone.

At this moment the news arrived at the camp of the proconsul that the cloud, so long gathering on the frontiers, was at last fully charged, and about to burst. The Roman province, it was added, was the quarter upon which the first fury of the tempest was destined

¹ Schol. Bob. in Orat. pro Sest. p. 297.: "Ipsi Cæsaris orationes contra hos exstant quibus et sua acta defendit et illos insectatur." Comp. Suet. Jul. 23. 73.

² Cæsar and Cicero must have left Rome almost on the same day. Cicero had reached Lucania April 8 (Ep. ad Att. iii. 2.). This date coincides with April 27 of the reformed calendar. Plutarch (Cæs. 14.)

to break. The Helvetii, having completed their preparations, appointed the twenty-eighth day of March for the meeting of their combined forces at the western outlet of the lake Lemanus.¹ The whole population of the assembled tribes amounted to three hundred and sixty-eight thousand souls, including the women and children; the number that bore arms was ninety-two thousand.² They cut themselves off from the means of retreat by giving ruthlessly to the flames every city and village of their land; twelve of the one class and four hundred of the other were thus sacrificed, and with them all their superfluous stores, their furniture, arms and implements. Cæsar's levies were still incomplete; he left his camp with only a few attendants, and reached the Rhone in eight days, at the point where the legion which defended the Province was awaiting his arrival.³ He immediately broke down the bridge at Geneva⁴, thus placing a strong natural barrier between the colony and the foe; for the stream which rushes from the lake has all the violence of a mountain torrent, with the volume of the outlet of a vast says, Καῖσαρ οὐ πρότερον ἐξῆλθεν ἐπὶ τὴν στρατείαν ή καταστασίασαι Κικέρων μετὰ Κλωδίου, καὶ συνεμβαλεῖν ἐκ τῆς Ἰταλίας. Comp. Abeken, Cic. in seinen Briefen, p. 111; Fischer, Röm. Zeittafeln, p. 239.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 6. March 28, A.U. 696 = April 16, B.C. 58.

² Cæs. B.G. i. 29.; Plut. Cæs. 18. makes the whole number somewhat less, but states the amount of the fighting-men at one hundred and ninety thousand. But compare what has been said, p. 238.

³ Cæsar's words are, "quam maximis potest itineribus in Galliam ulteriorem contendit," which leaves it uncertain whether he marched with his troops, or went alone for greater expedition. Plutarch, who however is to be read with great caution, says that he effected the transit in eight days: Ὁγδοῖς ἐπὶ τὸν Ρωμανὸν ἤλθεν. The march of a Roman army was ordinarily twenty miles a day (Veget. i. 10); but the biographer is speaking of Cæsar alone, and not of his troops. The distance from Rome to Geneva could not have been less than six hundred miles. Cicero indeed (pro Quint. 25.) reckons the distance to the territory of the Segusiani (Lyons) at seven hundred Roman miles.

⁴ Cæs. B.G. i. 6.: "Ex eo oppido pons ad Helvetios pertinet . . . pontem jubet rescindi."

reservoir. The Helvetii were startled at the pro-consul's sudden appearance, and his determination to forbid their progress. They attempted conciliation, and despatched a deputation to the Roman quarters, with instructions to represent their designs as innocent and peaceable, and to request a passage through the territories of the republic, that they might explore some land of refuge in the farthest extremities of the west. They bound themselves in the most solemn manner to respect the property of the provincials on their march. But it was not consistent with the views of the Roman government to allow of such manifold disturbance as the contemplated movement would produce. The shock of the proposed migration, by breaking up existing combinations, would dispossess the republic of all the advantages she enjoyed, and compel her to enter upon fresh intrigues and reconstruct her policy. Cæsar indeed makes no profession of looking so far; he merely says that he distrusted the faith of the Helvetii; and remembering their defeat of Cassius and the disgrace of a Roman army, which they had passed under the yoke, he regarded them as inveterate enemies to whom no favour should be shown, and from whom no moderation could be expected.

The Helvetii had assembled on the right bank of the Rhone, and awaited the return of their envoys from the Roman camp. In order to gain time for the arrival of the reinforcements which he expected, the pro-consul appointed them to come to him again to receive his answer on the thirteenth of April.¹ During the interval he set his soldiers to work with the spade and pickaxe, and drew a direct line of

The Helvetians attempt to cross the river and are repulsed.

¹ The Helvetii met on the 28th of March, but it is not said that they sent their deputation on that day, nor is it likely that they should have done so without some little delay for consultation. The author of the Précis des Guerres de César, which pretends to be ditch and rampart from the extremity of the lake to the point where it rushes into the gorge of the Jura. The skill and vigour of the Roman legionary sufficed to complete this fortification, about fifteen miles in length, in the course of the few days allotted to the task. On the ides of April the Helvetii returned, and renewed their application for leave to pass through the Province. Cæsar was now prepared with his reply. He declared that the history of the republic afforded no precedent for such a concession, and refused to entertain their demand. The Helvetii were not discouraged by this rebuff. They made some hasty preparations, and resolved to force the passage of the river. The fords in so impetuous a stream were extremely difficult and dangerous; nevertheless, they made several attempts to cross, both by day and night, sometimes by plunging into the river, sometimes with armaments of boats and rafts. But when they reached the opposite bank the rampart before them was defended with military skill, the space between was too narrow to offer them a secure footing, and they were compelled ultimately to abandon all hope of effecting their exit in this direction.¹

To skirt the right bank between the river and the mountains became now the more feasible of the two alternatives; but this could only be accomplished by securing the goodwill of the natives. The Sequani had declared their resolution to defend to the utmost this access to their territory, and had hitherto refused to entertain any proposals of negotiation with the intruders. But Dumnorix had been gained over the other route on the right bank of the Rhone.

They adopt
Cæsar increases his levies and follows them.

written from Napoleon's dictation to his attendant Marchand at St. Helena, calculates the extent of the work performed by Cæsar's legion, and estimates the time requisite at from ten to fifteen days (p. 34.).

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 8. Comp. Polyæn. Strategem. viii. 23.

by Orgetorix to the cause of the Helvetii. The death of his adviser had not damped the ambitious hopes which the Æduan had been led to conceive, and he was willing to offer any assistance towards an enterprise upon which he grounded his views of personal aggrandisement. By his intervention the Sequani were induced to grant the Helvetii the favour they desired, upon receiving pledges for their peaceable behaviour. The migrating hordes again declared that they had no other wish but to obtain a passage through the country of the Sequani and Ædui, that they might finally settle themselves in the western parts of Gaul. They pointed out the country of the Santones as the quarter where they proposed to establish their sovereignty. The Romans, however, apprehended that the settlement of so restless and warlike a people to the north of the Garonne, on which river some of their own most flourishing districts lay¹, would be a source of great inconvenience and danger. Not much was to be expected from the resistance which the Ædui might be disposed to make, nor had Cæsar yet sufficient strength at hand to follow the wanderers on their track, and support the efforts of his allies. For the moment he was obliged to leave them unmolested, while he hastened in person into Italy to collect and expedite the movement of additional troops. He left Labienus, a distinguished officer, whose merits will come frequently under our notice, to defend the rampart he had erected, while he urged forward in person the levy of two fresh legions. Three others he summoned from their station at Aquileia, and as soon as he had thus assembled a force of five legions, he hurried back into Gaul by the route of the Cottian Alps.²

¹ Cœs. B.G. i. 10.: “Non longè a Tolosatium finibus, . . . locis patentibus et maximè frumentariis.” Dion, xxxviii. 32.

² By the passage of the Mont Genevre to Briançon. The neighbouring route by Susa, the Mont Cenis and the valley of the Aïc was

He had chosen this line as the most direct for the point he had in view; but the path he chose was perhaps the least frequented of all the Alpine tracks, and his progress was obstructed by the mountain tribes, the Centrones, Garoceli, and Caturiges, who assembled to defend their fastnesses against the intrusion of the stranger. Cæsar cut his way through every obstacle. He crossed the Rhone above its confluence with the Saône. In the interval the Helvetii had threaded the defile of the Jura with all their enormous train of women and children, of horses and carriages, and were traversing the country between the two rivers. Cæsar hoped perhaps to meet and check them before they reached the further stream; but encumbered as they were, and slowly as they moved, they had already got before him, and his object was now no longer to meet but to pursue them. The Saône, the Arar of the Romans¹, offered no formidable barrier. Its width is moderate and its current gentle, though it is only in contrast to its furious neighbour that it can be represented as stagnant or sluggish; nor is it easy to understand the language of Cæsar, who declares that the eye can hardly distinguish which way it flows. This obstacle had already been overcome by the greater part of the advancing horde, though it had taken them twenty days to effect the transit; and the Ædui, who had not ventured to impede their passage, were now suffering the intruder's insolence with almost passive first rendered practicable by the native chief Cottius in the time of Augustus. It was from him that all the part of the Alpine chain, in which both these passes lie, derived the name of Cottian. It seems previously to have been known by the name of Julian, and that possibly from Cæsar's passage. The more usual but longer route would be that by the Col de Tiniers and Barcelonnette, discovered by Pompeius. Sall. Fr. Hist. iii. 3.; Appian, B.C. i. 109.; Walckenaer, G. des G. i. 225. 538.

¹ The modern name is traced in Sauône, the appellation given to it by Ammianus, xv. 11.

submission. They placed, indeed, their whole reliance upon Cæsar and the Roman forces, whose aid they loudly invoked in the name of their ancient alliance.¹ Their champions were advancing with rapid strides. The tribe of the Tigurini², constituting one fourth of the whole confederacy, had not yet crossed the Saone, when Cæsar came up with them, and instantly gave them battle with three legions. This was the same tribe which had destroyed L. Cassius and his army exactly fifty years before³. Among the Romans who had fallen on that day was the grandfather of Piso, Cæsar's father-in-law, and the energy of the Roman general was stimulated by the recollection of both a public and a private calamity.

He overtakes
the Tigurini and defeats
them. The barbarians were incommoded by the mass of baggage which had been placed under their care as forming the rearguard of the combined armament. The attack was totally unexpected. They were easily routed, and suffered immense slaughter, only a small remnant escaping into the woods in the vicinity.⁴

The Helvet-ians make overtures of negotiation. The fugitives were allowed to make their escape unmolested, while Cæsar proceeded to build a bridge with the greatest expedition, and transferred his army to the right bank of the Saone. The Helvetii were alarmed at the rapidity of his movements. Not only had he destroyed their rearguard in one battle; he had given another proof of vigour and skill far beyond their

¹ Dion, xxxviii. 32.

² The pagus Tigurinus may be the Canton of Zug or of Uri. Turicum, the name of Zurich in the middle ages, is proved to have been its Roman appellation also by an inscription, "sta(tio) Tu-ricen(sis)," found there in 1741. Walckenaer, i. 312.

³ A.U. 646. Appian, Fr. de Rebus Gall. iv. 3.: Οἱ Τιγύριοι δὲ αὐτῶν χρόνῳ ἐμπροσθεν Πελσωνος καὶ Κασσίου τινὰ στρατὸν ἐλόντες ὑπὸ Συγδύν ἐξεπεπόμφεσαν.

⁴ Cæs. B. G. i. 12. If the Tigurini amounted to 23,000 warriors, i. e. one fourth of the whole, they were probably out-numbered by three Roman legions with their Gaulish auxiliaries.

own in crossing the river in a single day. Accordingly, they sent a deputation to confer with him, and while they offered to submit their destination to his direction, and seek their future residence in any quarter that he should indicate, they attempted to disguise their apprehensions of a collision with his forces by reminding him of their former successes against the republic. The aged Divico, to whom the conduct of the negotiation was confided, had been the leader of their army in the famous battle of which they boasted; and the language of defiance and contemptuous warning would fall, they hoped, with greater weight from his lips.¹ But the pro-consul was not to be moved by such devices. The more they ventured to remind him of the calamities of the republic, the more, he said, would they incite him to avenge them. Moreover, it was no ancient quarrel he had come to renew; he sought compensation for their present insults to Rome and injuries to her allies. He ended, not with issuing directions regarding their destination, but by requiring them to make satisfaction to the Ædui, and to pledge themselves, by the delivery of hostages, to submit to whatever commands the republic should impose upon them. Divico arrogantly replied that his nation was more accustomed to take than to give hostages, as the Romans had good reason to know; and with this taunt the conference broke up.

The next morning the barbarians pursued their march. Cæsar, who had now brought up his whole forces, hung close upon their rear, and skirmishes took place between the cavalry of the two hosts. A brilliant success obtained by the Helvetii in an affair with the Æduan auxiliaries encouraged them to engage more frequently in these

The Helvetians march through the country of the Ædui, and are followed by Cæsar.
Disaffection of the Ædui to the republic.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 13, 14.

partial contests, which the Roman general, who could not trust either to the valour or constancy of his allies, was anxious on his part to avoid. In this way the rival armies moved for fifteen days up the course of the Saone¹; the one slowly and deliberately foraging for its supplies, and courting the attacks of the enemy's advanced guard; the other closely observing and following all its movements, but studiously declining a general engagement. The space thus traversed could not have been more than one hundred miles, when the emigrants made a movement to the left, and struck across the country, the Romans still hanging on their rear. This manœuvre reduced Cæsar to great difficulty. As long as he kept to the bank of the Saone, he could draw his supplies from the Roman province behind him.² But the Ædui on their part were extremely negligent in providing for his wants. While he was occupied in preventing the common enemy from destroying their villages and produce, they made no efforts to bring provisions to his camp. It was still early in June, and the standing corn was not yet ripe; nor if provisions had been ready to his hand, would it have suited his policy to irritate the natives by seizing them. Nevertheless, he resolved to persist in his previous tactics, and not to abandon the track of the enemy. He was compelled, however, at last to summon the chiefs of the Ædui, and make a formal complaint of their conduct.³ Liscus, the vergobret, replied in the name of his countrymen. He pointed to Dumnorix as the real though

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 15. The time which Cæsar assigns to this march creates some difficulty. The distance from Lyons to Chalons is not above ninety miles, and it was probably from the vicinity of the latter place that the Gauls turned to the west and abandoned the valley. It is evident that the Helvetii made no exertions to escape from their pursuer, and that he did not attempt to arrest their progress.

² Cæs. B.G. i. 16.

³ Cæs. B.G. i. 17—20.

concealed cause of all the coldness and tardiness which they had betrayed; but it was not till Cæsar withdrew him to a private conference that he ventured to expose the intrigues which were secretly in progress, the private understanding which existed between Dumnorix, the Helvetii, Bituriges and others, the hopes which he drew from their assurances, the power and influence which he had already acquired in his own country. The presence of the Romans was the sole obstacle to the consummation of his intrigues, and all his endeavours were now devoted to impeding their movements, and cutting off their resources, until they should be compelled to retreat. It even appeared that the disaster which had lately occurred to the Æduan cavalry was caused by his treachery. Divitiacus accompanied the expedition in the proconsul's retinue. Though conscious that his brother's schemes were directed no less against the liberty than the best policy of their common country, he threw himself at Cæsar's feet, and used every solicitation to save the culprit's life. It may be remarked that though he had been two or three years resident in Rome, he was unable to express himself in the Latin tongue; a circumstance the more surprising considering the admiration with which he regarded the life and manners of the civilized south. Cæsar made use of an interpreter in conversing with him.¹ Dumnorix was spared; but the proconsul gave him to understand the peril into which he had thrown himself, and placed his actions under vigilant observation.

The Helvetii were now making their way slowly across the hilly country which separates the feeders of the Saone, the Loire, and the Seine. In the centre of this tract

Cæsar engages the Helvetii in a decisive battle, and entirely defeats them.

¹ Cæs. B. G. i. 19.: "Divitiacum ad sc. vocari jubet, et quotidianis interpretibus remotis, per C. Valerium Procillum, principem lies the city of Autun, originally named Bibracte, the capital of the Ædui. Cæsar still following close upon the heels of the advancing host, found himself at a distance of eighteen miles from this place, apparently to the northward.¹ Here, however, it became necessary to cease from pursuit, and make for the city, where the provisions he demanded awaited him. This abandonment of his previous tactics, much as he might regret its necessity at the time, prepared for him an opportunity of giving battle on ground of his own choice. The Helvetii, regarding it as a flight, exulted in it as a symptom either of weakness or cowardice. Turning round to follow their late pursuer, their advanced columns soon fell in with the rear of the Roman legions. Cæsar had time to select his position on the side of a hill², along which he ranged his infantry in three lines, allowing the cavalry to descend into the plain, and there sustain the first shock of the assailants. The Helvetii, placing their baggage and waggons in the rear, charged with the whole weight of their mass in compact order. The Roman cavalry soon gave way before them, and retired without confusion upon the lines of infantry. Hereupon the general, dismounting first from his own charger, caused the cavalry to dismount also, and send their horses in the rear, that all might be on an equality. It is evident that he distrusted his auxiliaries, of whom that arm was entirely composed¹, who served under the command of Dumnorix; and he feared lest any weakness or treachery on their part should discourage his own legionaries. The Gauls advanced in close array, their shields interlaced above their heads to repel the expected discharge of stones and arrows. But the massive pilum of the Roman infantry did better service than any such light missiles. Hurled from a vantage ground it pierced the wooden targets through and through, entangling several together, and depriving their bearers of the free use of their arms. The array of the barbarian phalanx was thus loosened and broken, and as soon as its confusion was perceived, down rushed the Romans upon it with the drawn sword. The Gauls could either make no resistance or were forced to abandon their shields to extricate themselves from one another. After a short combat they fled to another hill at the distance of a mile hotly pressed and followed up the acclivity. A diversion was here created in their favour by the arrival of the Boii and Tulingi, who were the last to reach the field of action, and were now able to check the advance of the Romans. The conflict continued to rage with unabated fury in the space between the two hills. The Gauls gradually retreated upon their waggons, but always presenting their face to their opponents. The entrenchment which they had hastily thrown up, and behind which they had so long defended themselves, was at last carried; but a vast body escaped from the field, one hundred and thirty thousand according to Cæsar's computation, and succeeded, by rapid marches northward, in reaching the borders of the Lingones in four days. The care of the wounded and the necessity of seeking provisions at Bibracte, prevented Cæsar from pursuing them. But his victory had been sufficiently decisive, and the loss of the vanquished was tremendous. He hoped that the letters he despatched to the Lingones, threatening them with the vengeance of the republic if they gave food or succour to the fugitives, would effect the destruction of the remainder, or force them to surrender. After a halt of only three days he found himself once more in a condition to follow upon their track.

Gallia provinciæ, familiarem suum, cui summam rerum omnium fidem habebat, cum eo colloquitur."

¹ Cæs. B. G. i. 23.

² Cæsar ranged his four veteran legions on the side of the hill, and kept the two legions of raw levies in reserve on the summit (c. 24.). His whole legionary force therefore might amount to 36,000 men, and we may add at least half as many more for auxiliaries. The disparity of numbers between his forces and those of the enemy, reduced by the loss of the Tigurini, was not very great. In point of skill, discipline, and the material of war, there could be no comparison between them. The only danger of the Romans lay in the doubtful fidelity of their allies.

¹ It appears from c. 42. that there were no Roman horse in the army.

The Lingones had no sympathy with the unwel-

Terms granted to the Helvetii. They are compelled to return into their own country. come intruders, and being secure of Cæsar's support, they wanted no further inducement to engage them to refuse the wanderers a passage. Disheartened and famishing the remnant of the crumbling host were soon compelled to surrender, and submit to any terms which the victor should be pleased to impose upon them. His measures were indeed sufficiently lenient, but for this he had a political object. The laws of war as interpreted by the Romans placed an enemy, when captured with arms in his hands, entirely at the disposal of the conqueror. Sometimes the whole nation was sold into slavery, sometimes it was even put indiscriminately to the sword, if vengeance or policy seemed to demand it. But Cæsar, inflexible as was his severity whenever he deemed it fitting, accepted on this occasion the surrender of his helpless enemies as an act of voluntary submission, and contented himself with commanding them to return in a body to their own country. It was important that the space which they had left vacant should be peopled again, as otherwise it would have attracted a colony of Germans, and brought a new and restless neighbour to the very doors of the Province. He said upon the Allobroges the burden of furnishing the survivors of the horde with the necessary provisions, until they could rebuild their habitations and restore their soil to cultivation. A small body of six thousand men had escaped from this convention, and were trying to cut their way into Germany. They were brought back to the Roman camp by the zeal of the Gaulish tribes through whom they had to pass, and these the proconsul, as he tells us, treated as enemies; a phrase of fearful import, which leaves us only uncertain whether they were put to the sword or sold as slaves. The tribe of the Boii were allowed to remain in the interior of Gaul, at the instance of the Ædui themselves, who admired their military prowess, and wished to settle them as allies and defenders in some districts of their own country. The whole number of those who returned to their homes amounted to one hundred and ten thousand souls.¹

The Gauls were penetrated with surprise and admiration at the power of the republic, which, at this distance from its home, had struck down an enemy before whom their own concentrated energies had quailed. The ability of the leader and the constancy of his legions through all the fatigues of so long a march, and the pressure of so many difficulties, impressed them with a higher sense of the character of their ancient rivals

The Gauls
eager to pay their court to the victorious proconsul.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 21—29. Cæsar caused a census to be taken. In the Helvetian camp lists were found in which the names of the several confederate tribes and their respective contingents were registered. These documents were written literis Græcis, either in the Greek language or more probably in Greek characters. It cannot be supposed that the Helvetii were familiar with the language, since Cæsar (B.G. v. 48) uses it expressly to conceal the purport of his dispatches from the Nervii, who, rude as they were themselves, might easily have found an interpreter if such knowledge had been generally diffused among the southern Gauls. Cæsar employs the same phrase in speaking of the druids: "In publicis privatisque rationibus Græcis utuntur literis" (comp. Tac. Germ. 3.). Their acquaintance with the Greek alphabet would be derived from Massilia.

than national vanity had hitherto allowed them to entertain. They began at last to recognize the Romans as a superior race. Every state hastened to vie with its neighbours in strains of respect and adulation. Deputations crowded one upon another, congratulating the proconsul on his success, expressing the thanks of the Gaulish people for a deliverance such as they dared least expect from a stranger, so recently their deadly foe. But for Roman intervention Gaul, they confessed, would have been overrun from the Rhine to the Ocean, its cities destroyed, its political relations subverted, and the yoke of servitude imposed perhaps upon the entire nation.

But if their most imminent danger had been that of conquest by the Helvetii, the prospect of the advance of the Germans was not in reality less alarming. In the midst of their rejoicings for their late deliverance, the Gaulish chieftains still exhibited tokens of secret apprehension.

Their apprehension of the encroachments of the Suevi. They communicated their fears to Cæsar, and desired his permission to convene an assembly of delegates from various states to determine upon a plan of united action.¹ The council was accordingly held. The result was that the deputies returned to the Roman camp, and placed themselves entirely at the proconsul's disposal. The whole affair was transacted with the utmost secrecy. The Gaulish chieftains, especially the Æduan, were so cowed by the tyranny of Ariovistus, that they dared not utter their apprehensions above their breath. It was not till they were assured of the discretion as well as the favour of the Roman, that they ventured, with Divitiacus for their spokesman, to expose the state of their relations with the German intruders, the oppression under which they were suffering, their ardent thirst for deliverance, and their resolution to put themselves under the guidance of their puissant ally.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 30.: “Petierant uti sibi concilium totius Galliæ in diem certam indiceret,” &c. Some writers imagine from this and one or two similar expressions that the whole of the Gaulish tribes were united in a general confederation, and consulted together occasionally for the common good. But this opinion has no foundation. The author of the Commentaries uses the word totus in a very loose way. He is here speaking only of the two confederations of which the Ædui and Arverni were respectively at the head, as appears clearly from the following chapter. But these embraced none of the states of Aquitania, Belgium, nor even the western division of Gaul. It was not likely that the people of Armorica or the tribes on the Rhine should have asked permission to attend a general convention from a Roman commander whose name could scarcely have reached them.

The command which the Helvetii had received to return to their original seats, and maintain their ancient barriers against the Germans, foreshadowed the policy of the Roman general. With whatever hopes of amity the senate might have amused Ariovistus, he could not but feel assured that the intentions of the proconsul, whom it had sent to manage the affairs of Gaul with absolute power, were decidedly hostile to his views. Cæsar had settled the question between him and the Ædui as to which of the two Rome should keep her word with; it was hardly possible to be true to both, and the governor of the province had perhaps no other alternative but to choose between them. Nor was the attitude adopted by the German chieftain calculated to disarm the jealousy of the republic. He declared formally that he had entered Gaul as a conqueror, equally with the Romans, and he claimed to share the country with the invaders from the south: You have your province, he said, *and I will have mine.*¹ The Romans could endure no such

He espouses
the cause of the Gauls against the intruders.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 44.; or in the words of Florus, iii. 10.: "Quid es Cæsar? si vult, veniat: quid ad illum quid agat nostra Germania? num ego me interpono Romanis?"

partnership. Their influence in Gaul beyond the Rhone rested mainly upon the reliance which the natives might be induced to place on their will and power to protect them. They well knew how the prevalence of such an opinion would assist in breaking up the national spirit of independence, and they already foresaw the rapid absorption of new victims into the mass of their conquests. Cæsar, in fact, embodied the sentiments and policy of his countrymen, in the career upon which he now deliberately entered, by which he designed to train his armies to victory, to enrich his followers, and to surround his person with admiring crowds of Roman and provincial adherents.

The demands, however, which the proconsul made

Ariovistus refuses the proconsul's terms of accommodation.

upon the German chieftain bore a semblance of moderation, and were such as a potentate of less pride and wilfulness might have secured his safety by accepting.¹ He was required to transport no more of his countrymen across the Rhine, to restore their hostages to the Ædui and Sequani, and to enter into relations of amity with the states upon which he had hitherto trampled. On these conditions the proconsul pledged himself to maintain the good understanding which had thus far subsisted between the rival powers. He would urge no pretensions to diminish the authority which Ariovistus had acquired in Gaul. But the barbarian, flushed with success, would listen to no proposals which did not recognise his sudden and precarious occupation of Gallic territory as an equal title to independent sovereignty with the slowly-consolidated dominion of the Romans. He courted war as between two equal and rival powers; the alliance which the Romans had formed with the Gaulish states he treated with scorn, and disputed their right to step forward as the defenders of the Ædui. While these discussions were in progress, certain of that nation came to Cæsar with further complaints of the violation of their territory by the German warriors: at the same moment the Treviri also besought his assistance to prevent an incursion of the Suevi, one hundred of whose cantons had already assembled all their forces on the bank of the Rhine, for the purpose of a general migration. It was of the utmost importance to strike a blow before this multitude could effect a junction with Ariovistus. Cæsar immediately placed himself at the head of his legions, and marched towards the encamp-Cæsar commences hostilities.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 34—36

 ment of the German chieftain, prepared to bring the conference to a close in person, or to enforce his demands by arms. When he had reached Vesontio (Besançon) in the country of the Sequani, Panic in the Roman army.
 where it was necessary to halt a few days to provision the troops, symptoms of insubordination began to manifest themselves in the Roman camp.¹ The proconsul was attended, according to the custom of the times, by a number of young men of family, who came to make under his eye their first essay of arms. The hardships and perils of a Gallic campaign, against savage foes and in an ungenial climate, were more appalling to their imaginations than the service to which their fathers had devoted themselves in Asia, the land of luxuries and pleasures. The name of the Gauls indeed had been stripped of much of its ancient terror; but the republic had not encountered the Germanic races since the invasion of the Teutones, and the hard-won victory of Marius had failed to obliterate the remembrance of her last great panic. Accordingly, when the Sequani were interrogated about the Germans, and described them as the most terrible of men, of tremendous stature, of hideous form, of savage cruelty, warriors who had not slept under a roof for fourteen years¹, the shattered nerves of the dissolute patricians gave way. From these effeminate volunteers the alarm spread to the veterans, and pervaded the camp. Many sought leave of absence and fled from the danger; others, whom a sense of honour retained at their standards, were yet unable to conceal their fears, and did even more harm by remaining.² It required all Cæsar's address and patience to make head against the growing spirit of dismay. He advised men and officers in private, he harangued them in public, and when at last every counsel and consolation failed, he threw himself with the tact of an old general, upon their feelings of pride and emulation. No commander, he said, had ever been ruined, unless by the desertion of his fortune or his own injustice. He declared his reliance upon the fortune which had already so conspicuously attached itself to him, at the same time he was no less animated by the consciousness of his rectitude. Such was his confidence, that he was resolved to go through with the affair he had undertaken, though with no more than a single legion. The tenth legion he knew he could trust, and with the services of all the rest, if they chose to desert him, he could afford to dispense. To the tenth legion the defence of the Province had been committed at the commencement of Cæsar's proconsulate. It was the same, perhaps, which had rendered Pomptinus victorious over the Allobroges, and it had more recently maintained the line of the Rhone against the threatened invasion of the Helvetii.³ The favoured division received the compliment with ac-

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 39–41.; comp. Plut. Cæs. 19.; Dion, xxxviii. 35.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 36.

² Florus, iii. 10., copying Cæsar, c. 39. "Itaque tantus gentis novæ terror in castris, ut testamenta passim etiam in principiis scriberentur."

³ Guischard, Mém. Milit. iii. 15.

clamations, while the rest of the army, stung with remorse, determined to wipe off the stain of cowardice, and declared their readiness to dare the worst.

Having thus arrested the contagion of terror among his soldiery, their leader lost no time in bringing them into the enemy's presence. Nevertheless, he was anxious to conduct the quarrel, if possible, to a peaceable issue, and accordingly he proposed a conference to the German chieftain. They met on a hill rising from the centre of a plain, where they could be observed by either army, and the openness of the ground offered no lurking-place for an ambuscade.¹ Each was attended by a squadron of cavalry of equal numbers. Cæsar had no Roman cavalry, nor could he safely confide in his Gaulish auxiliaries: yet he would not reject the arrangement proposed by his adversary, nor betray any appearance of distrust or dread. He caused a party of Gauls to dismount, and placed upon their horses the infantry of his favourite legion. Thus escorted he met Ariovistus at the appointed spot, and recommenced a discussion upon the points which had already been debated between them. The disputants failed, as before, to satisfy each other. Cæsar persisted in his previous demands with the firmness of a Roman imperator, representing the fixed resolution of the government of which he declared himself merely the agent. Ariovistus had nothing but his own will, his own views and policy, to appeal to: though moderate and even respectful in manner, he had no less confidence and constancy than his rival. Each party urged his own right to make conquests over the Gauls. The German, indeed, admitted the equal claims of both, while the Roman contended that the priority of his own country's relations with Gaul gave it the right of excluding from the ground all other competitors. The conference, we are told, was interrupted by the impatience of the German horse, who suddenly assailed the Romans with stones and arrows. Cæsar immediately withdrew, and prepared for more serious hostilities. A further attempt at negotiation failed through the inconstancy of the German chief, who invited the Roman general to a second conference, but treated as spies the envoys whom he sent in his stead, and threw them into chains.¹

Cæsar has a conference with Ariovistus.

The spot at which these occurrences took place Decisive battle between the Romans and
Germans. lay in the space between the two armies, which were twenty-four miles apart. Cæsar abstained from advancing, and formed a large entrenched camp to contain the whole of his forces, in expectation of an immediate attack from the Suevi, who manoeuvred around him, and established their lines, at a distance of two miles, between him and Vesontio, whence he drew his supplies. Finding the enemy disposed to defer the contest, it was now the Roman's wish to compel him to fight. Cæsar led his troops in front of the German position, and drew them up in battle array, but to no purpose. This operation he repeated several days in succession; still the Germans, generally so impetuous and so confident of victory, would neither attack him in his trenches nor meet him in the open field. It appeared from the account of some captives that this reserve was not the effect of the superior discipline introduced by Ariovistus, but ¹ Cæs. B. G. i. 46, 47. Cæsar seems anxious to represent the perfidy of the barbarian in the strongest colours, and does not fail to inform us that his envoys, C. Valerius Proculus and M. Mettius, were selected by him as having been guests of Ariovistus. It will be remembered that our accounts of these transactions, drawn almost entirely from Cæsar's own narrative, are ordinarily unchecked by any independent authority. The Romans themselves questioned Cæsar's candour; nevertheless, it would seem that their self-love forbade them to refute his statements.

arose from a motive of superstition. On such occasions, they reported, whether to fight or to refrain was determined by the decision of the women, whom the Germans were wont to regard with peculiar deference.¹ The women had consulted together, according to the prescribed forms of divination, and declared that their countrymen could not conquer if they engaged before the new moon.² Having ascertained the cause of the enemy's inactivity, Cæsar took advantage of it to make a movement by which he outflanked them, and then entrenched a second camp in the rear of their position, thereby re-establishing his communications. He was now in a situation to force a battle, and at last, after one or two indecisive skirmishes, he was gratified by seeing the whole German host issue from its camp and spread over the plain, tribe by tribe, the women and children in the rear, intermingled with the vast assemblage of waggons, placed apparently on purpose to cut off the possibility of flight. The barbarians formed in huge phalanxes, the men raising their shields, as the Helvetii had done, like an enormous coat of mail, over their heads. The Romans threw their piles, and rushed headlong upon the unwieldy mass, each man marking his own object and making directly for it. Unable to break the compact lines of the enemy, they leaped upon them, and, tearing up the serried shields, pierced their half-stifled bearers from above; a desperate mode of attack, to which little resistance could be offered, but exposing to inevitable death the assailant who should fall into the midst. The right wing of the Germans was at last broken and scattered in flight; but the left resisted, and, swaying slowly this way and that, over-powered the forces confronted with it. The third line or reserve of the Romans was then brought into the field, and at last the Germans were thoroughly routed on every side. The fugitives burst through the barrier of waggons in their rear, and fled precipitately towards the Rhine. The distance was only five miles¹, and the pursuit was not slackened to the very brink of the river. Ariovistus succeeded in crossing by means of a boat: not many of his followers were equally fortunate. Some swam the stream, but a far greater number were overtaken and put to the sword. The women shared perhaps the fate of the combatants. Two wives of the German king perished²; of their daughters one was slain, another captured. The Roman general was well pleased to recover Procillus, the bearer of the late flag of truce, whose guards were overtaken while dragging him along in their flight. Three times, he related, had lots been drawn in his presence, to decide whether he should be burnt at once, in sacrifice, or reserved for a future occasion; each time he had owed his life to the chance of sortilege.¹

¹ The superstitious veneration paid to women by the Germans is noticed by Tacitus (Germ. 8.): "Inesse sanctum quid et providum foemini putant, nec aut consilia earum aspernantur, aut responsa negant." See also Hist. iv. 61. Strabo makes the same remark of the Cimbri (vii. 2). Dion (xxxviii. 48.) follows Cæsar.

² Tac. Germ. 11.

¹ The manuscripts of Cæsar read quinque, which agrees with the old Greek translation, τεσσαράκοντα στάδια. But Plutarch makes the distance four hundred stadia, or fifty miles. The context gives little assistance towards determining between these accounts. We only know that Cæsar marched seven days after leaving Besançon, and made a circuit of fifty miles. The distance of Besançon from the Rhine, in a direct line, is about eighty miles. Adopting the reading of our text, the field of battle would probably lie between Bâle and Muhlhausen.

² “Utræque perierant,” Cæs., whom Orosius flatly contradicts, saying: “duæ captæ sunt.” It would not be worth while to mention this discrepancy, but to point out, once for all, the extreme carelessness of many of the later writers in going over Cæsar’s ground, although they must have had his commentaries in their hands. The only work which could have come into competition with his, for the author’s means of personal knowledge, was the history of his own times by Asinius Pollio, but we are not informed whether that writer entered into the details of the Gaulish campaigns. About plurality of wives among the Germans, comp. Tac. Germ. 18.

The Suevi who, as before mentioned, had arrived on the banks of the Rhine, and were preparing to cross into Gaul, and share the flourishing fortunes of their countrymen, were struck with consternation at the apparition of the flying king and his routed horde. They had no further appetite for aggression, and would gladly have returned in safety to their homes. But the Ubii,² whose hostility they had provoked on their march, turned upon them, and made great slaughter in their ranks. The soil of Gaul was thus delivered from the German invaders, and its security in that quarter seemed at least for a time to be sufficiently assured.³ The proconsul led his troops into winter quarters among the Sequani, where he left Labienus in command. Having accomplished both his immediate objects in two campaigns and a single season, he retired for the winter into the Hither Gaul, and convened the annual assembly of that province.⁴

When Cæsar entered the Transalpine province he found, as we have seen, only a single legion observing the frontiers. The colonies of the republic were defended by a provincial militia, forming not separate legions, but a number of flying cohorts attached to the regular force.⁵ The

Composition
of Cæsar's
legions.

¹ Cæs. B.G. i. 53.

² The Ubii, better known in later times as a Cisrheneane people, dwelt at this period beyond the Rhine, to the South of the Sigambri, probably on the Mayn and Lahn, surrounded by the Suevi. Comp. Zeuss, die Deutschen, &c. p. 87.

³ It seems that Ariovistus died shortly afterwards. Comp. B.G. v. 29.: "Magno esse Germanis dolori Ariovisti mortem."

⁴ Cæs. B.G. i. 54.

⁵ It appears from the inscription of a coin (Thes. Goltz. p. 237.) that the colony of Arausio (Orange) was founded by the thirty-third cohort of the second legion. See Harduin. ad Plin. H.N. iii. 4.

rapidity of communication by means of the great roads, with which it was the policy of the Romans to connect every important position, may have enabled them to dispense with stationary garrisons in every principal town. The full complement of the legion amounted to about six thousand infantry. For its complete equipment it required also a body of three hundred horse: but the cavalry which Cæsar employed throughout his Gallic campaigns was almost entirely Gaulish.¹ This compact body was attended into the field by auxiliary forces composed of the allies or subjects of the republic, not levied from the neighbouring states only, but drawn also from more distant possessions. Cæsar brought into the field javelinmen from Numidia, bowmen from Crete, and slingers from the Balearic isles.² Besides the legion already stationed in the province, the state furnished the proconsul with three more; and these he had summoned from Aquileia to join in the pursuit of the Helvetii. But not satisfied with the number prescribed him by the decrees of the senate and people,³ he undertook to raise two others in addition at his own charge,⁴ though he afterwards contrived to make the state maintain them. Nor, when the magnitude of his operations required fresh succours, did he restrict himself even to this number. In the second year of the war we shall see him enter the ¹ Spanish cavalry are mentioned B.G. v. 26. It is probable also that Cæsar had some Numidian squadrons (ii. 7.). Guischard, Mém. Milit. iii. 37.

² Cæs. B.G. ii. 7. The Numidian light infantry used darts four feet in length. Polyb. i. 74.; Appian, Hisp. 25., Pun. ii. 71.

Comp. Lucan, iv. 680.:

“ Aequaturusque sagittas Medorum tremulum cum torsit missile Mazax.”

³ Plut. Cæs. 14., Pomp. 48., Cat. Min. 33.; Dion, xxxviii. 41.

⁴ Suet. Jul. 24.

country of the Nervii with eight legions,¹ and provide himself with at least three others at a later period, to occupy a more extended field of enterprise.²

These troops, composed partly of veterans, but principally of new conscripts, were gradually inured to equal discipline and bravery, and vied with each other in feats of prowess and devotion to their commander. Their great leader was not insensible how much he owed to their faithful services. No general was ever more lavish of his praises than he who recorded his soldiers' achievements in his own commentaries on his wars. Distinguished as all the legions were in turn, there was one, the tenth, in which, as we have seen, Cæsar placed peculiar confidence, and which he has exalted by his encomiums to celebrity in military annals. And as with his soldiers, so was it also with his officers. Cæsar betrayed no jealousy of the merits of Labienus, the foremost of that renowned band. Nor had he any occasion to fear the rivalry even of the best of the captains formed in his school; for Labienus, who had acquired immortal laurels in Gaul, as second to the proconsul, was destined to fail no less signally when he deserted to an enemy, and arrayed himself against his former leader. The proconsul carried with him Quintus, the brother of Marcus Cicero, and Publius, the son of the triumvir Crassus: both of them became good officers under his eye. Cotta and Sabinus, Trebonius and Decimus Brutus, obtained distinction under the same auspices. The two former were cut off by the sudden attack of an overwhelming enemy; the two latter survived to conspire against their generous commander, the founder of their fame and fortunes.¹

Military reputation acquired by his troops.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 23.

² Cæs. B.G. vi. 32. These included one which Cæsar borrowed of Pompeius in the year 700, and again restored to him, on his demand, four years afterwards. Cæs. B.G. vi. 1., viii. 54.; Appian, B.C. ii. 29; Dion, xl. 65.

¹ Guischard (Mém. Milit. iii. 46.) gives a complete list of Cæsar's officers, as far as they are known to us: T. Labienus, P. Considius, Q. Pedius, Q. Titurius Sabinus, L. Aurunculeius Cotta, Servius Galba, Decimus Brutus, P. Sulpicius Rufus, Q. Atrius, C. Trebonius, C. Fabius, Q. Cicero, L. Roscius, L. Munatius Plancus, L. Silanus, C. Antistius Regulus, T. Sextius, C. Volcatius Tullus, L. Minucius Basilus, L. Cæsar, M. Antonius, Caninius Rebilus, M. Sempronius Rutilus, Q. Calenus, P. Crassus, and P. Vatinius. Most of these personages we shall find distinguished in various ways in the eventful years which followed.

CHAPTER VII.

Cæsar's Second Campaign in Gaul, A.U. 697. B.C. 57.—War with the Belgians.—Reduction of the Suessiones and Bellovaci.—Gallant Resistance of the Nervii.—General Submission of the Belgian Tribes, and of the North-western States of Gaul.—Unsuccessful Campaign of Galba in the Alps.—Cæsar's Third Campaign, A.U. 698.—Reduction of the Veneti and Armorican Tribes.—P. Crassus conquers the Aquitanians.—Cæsar chastises the Menapii and Morini.—Pacification of Gaul.

THE state of affairs in Gaul had undergone considerable change during the few months which Cæsar had occupied in its defence. Two formidable hordes of invaders had been defeated and expelled, and the power of the Germans, which had threatened the country with permanent subjugation, was so effectually broken, that the frontier tribes of Gaul might hope again to see the day when they should push their incursions across the Rhine, instead of being the prey of adventurers from beyond it. But in the place of these two enemies the Gauls had introduced far into the interior of their country a power which, under the name of friend and ally, already threatened to reduce them not less completely to servitude. When Cæsar crossed the Alps for the winter he quartered his troops, not within the limits of the Roman province, but in the territory of the Sequani. What was the meaning of this innovation? Was there any possibility of Ariovistus returning after his signal defeat with another horde of Suevi to recover his Gallic possessions? or were the Sequani, weakened as they now were by the oppression of the Germans, exposed so helplessly to the hatred of the Aedui as to require

Review of the state of Gaul.
A.U. 697.
B.C. 57.

a Roman garrison for their protection? The pro-consul, it would appear, already anticipated the aggressive movement which was about to take place among the Belgian tribes. The Sequani he knew had fallen for ever from that high estimation among the Gauls, in virtue of which they had been allowed to assume the pre-eminence heretofore occupied by the Arverni. Not only their political weakness, but the remembrance also of their treachery in inviting the Germans across the Rhine, disgusted the petty states which had formerly served them as clients. Of these some now betook themselves to the Ædui with the offer of allegiance; others, not forgetting the tyranny of that nation during its prosperity, and suspicious of a people who piqued themselves on their intimacy with the Romans, looked out for another patron. The Remi were the most powerful of the Belgian tribes. They envied the position to which the chief states of southern Gaul had attained as leaders of numerous confederacies, and rejoiced in succeeding to a part at least of the influence lately enjoyed by the Sequani.¹ They also were in turn distrusted by the other Belgic states, which hastened to form an alliance among themselves, while the Remi haughtily kept aloof.

Meanwhile the Romans, on their part, were improving the advantages they had secured. The Romans establish their influence over the Sequani. The establishment of their winter quarters among the Sequani gave them paramount influence over that broken and dejected people. They restored the hostages of whose retention the Ædui so bitterly complained; but in return they surrounded their camps and councils with Roman spies and agents, and contrived to get into their own hands the real direction of their affairs. The blandishments of Italian civilization were found efficient in reconciling the proudest of the Gauls to the universal yoke. Divitiacus, the gentle victim of southern luxury, was a useful instrument in the conquerors' hands ; while the restless intrigues of his brother Dumnorix awakened no response in the breasts of a people already dreaming of a new career of supremacy under foreign patronage.

¹ Cæsar (B. G. vi. 12.), speaking of this period, says: "Eo tum statu res erat, ut longe principes haberentur Ædui, secundum locum dignitatis Remi obtinarent."

While the Ædui were thus familiarizing themselves with these silken fetters, the Remi also were not unwilling to bend before the influence of Rome, with the hope of consolidating their own power. But the other Belgian tribes, unbroken as yet by war and uncorrupted by artifice, combined together under the head of the Suessiones, and rose in arms against the intruders.¹ The rumour of their intended outbreak reached Cæsar before it had actually burst forth. He hastened to raise two new legions, and hurried back from Italy to the scene of danger. The Belgians had met in a general conference ; the Suessiones, the Nervii, the Bellovaci, the Atrebates, the Ambiani, the Morini, the Menapii, the Caletes, the Velocasses, the Veromandui, all the nations between the mouths of the Meuse and the Seine, together with those of the interior² : to these were added the tribes of German descent ; the Eburones, Condrusi, Cæresi, and *Pæmani*³, all joined in this mighty coalition : the armies it brought into the field numbered altogether two hundred and ninety thousand men. The

Confederacy
of the Belgian tribes against the invaders.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 4. and foll. Under the sway of a chieftain named Divitiacus, the Suessiones had recently become the most flourishing and powerful of the Belgian states and had extended their sovereignty over a part of Britain.

² These names are identified with the following modern places and districts respectively, Soissons, Hainault, Beauvais, Artois, Amiens, the coast of the Pas du Calais and West Flanders, East Flanders, Pays de Caux in Normandy, the Vexin, the Vermandois.

³ Brabant, Liege, and Limburg.

Remi alone refused to league themselves in the common cause¹, and attempted in vain to sow dissension among the confederates. Upon them accordingly the whole weight of the Belgian forces was in the first instance directed. They appealed to the proconsul for protection, and offered to place themselves entirely at his disposal. They sent him hostages, and proposed to open their fortresses to his soldiers. Cæsar embraced their offer with alacrity, promised them the protection of the republic, and at the same time took measures to secure their entire dependence for the future. The Roman forces were immediately put in motion to succour the suppliant state. The Ædui meanwhile showed their usual want of fidelity or of vigour; the assistance demanded of them was tardily and reluctantly supplied. Divitiacus, still attending upon Cæsar, and still entranced in admiration of him, conjured his countrymen to give their succours freely and liberally. The legions advanced to the banks of the Axona (Aisne), which they crossed, and then awaited in an entrenched camp the expected attack of the Gallo-Germans.

Bibrax, or Bibracte, the capital of the Remi, eight miles distant from the Roman encampment, was at this moment assailed by the confederates. Their mode of attack was to Commencement of the war : Cæsar's second campaign. clear the ramparts by a constant discharge of stones and arrows, and to advance parties of sappers to their foot under the cover of a storm of missiles, their shields firmly compacted over their heads. Their progress was slow, but its success seemed certain. The defenders were exhausted with wounds and fatigue. At last they found means of communicating with the Roman general. They represented that they were not in a condition to hold out longer; unless prompt assistance arrived the place was lost. Cæsar hastily despatched some cavalry and light troops, which penetrated the loose array of the blockading forces, and were received within the walls. The Belgians, disappointed at the escape of their prey, had not the firmness to recommence their frustrated work: after spending a few days in ravaging the neighbourhood, they broke up from their lines and advanced towards the Roman position. Cæsar's eagle eye measured the long extent of their front by the smoke of their fires by day and the flames at night, and estimated it at not less than eight miles.

¹ The Remi were a powerful people, and occupied probably a great part of the three departments of Aisne, Marne, and Ardennes. Bibracte (Bièvre) is sometimes mentioned as their capital, and sometimes Durocortorum (Rheims).

The numbers of the enemy and their reputation for superior prowess made Cæsar pause before he ventured to give them battle. The result of a few cavalry skirmishes reassured him, and he resolved to challenge the Belgians to a general engagement. The confederates issued from their camp as soon as they beheld the Romans before them, and prepared to receive the shock. The proconsul's camp was placed on the summit of a gentle acclivity. In front the ground, as it sloped towards the plain, offered sufficient space for the evolutions of the six legions which he brought at once into action. His rear reclined upon the river, and he communicated with the further bank by a bridge, commanded by an earthwork at its head, and guarded by a small detachment. The two fresh legions he kept, according to his general practice, as a reserve within his lines. But as his principal danger lay in the risk of being outflanked by superior numbers, he drew a trench from either side of the hill to a distance of four hundred paces, and erected works at each extremity, which he fortified with great care, and equipped with military engines. Thus advantageously posted, the Romans were sheltered moreover by a morass in their front, into which they hoped

The Belgians attack Cæsar's position on the Aisne,

the enemy would impetuously plunge.¹ But the Gallo-Germans possessed prudence and caution no less than bravery, and rested on their arms awaiting the onset of the Romans as invaders and aggressors. The cavalry engaged, and the Romans had the best of the encounter; but when he found that the Belgians could not be induced to charge, Cæsar withdrew his legions within his camp.

Thus unsuccessful in drawing the Romans from their position, the Belgians changed their plan. By a lateral movement they reached the banks of the river at a place where the stream was fordable, with the intention of crossing it, and thus throwing themselves upon the enemy's rear. As soon, however, as the detachment at the bridge head observed this demonstration, they apprised the general, and he immediately despatched his horse and light troops to prevent its taking effect. These squadrons, crossing the river by the bridge, reached the ford before the Belgians had made good their passage, and attacked them with their missiles while yet struggling in the middle of the stream. A party which had already gained the opposite side was surrounded and cut to pieces by the cavalry. The attempt, though persisted in with obstinate bravery, completely failed, and the Belgians were forced to betake themselves again to their former quarters. The country which they had ravaged began now to fail in supplies; while at the same time they heard that Divitiacus, having collected the Æduan forces, had entered their confines, and was carrying fire and sword to their own homes. The confederates, ill-but are defeated with great slaughter.

¹ Cæsar's position is said to have been a little below Pont-à-Vaire, on the Aisne, where a morass still exists in the direction which he indicates. A camp placed here would be distant 14,000 toises from Rheims, 22,000 from Soissons, 16,000 from Laon, and 8,000 from Bièvre, which is supposed to have been Bibracte of the Remi. Précis des Guerres de César, p. 44.; Mannert, ii. 207.

assorted and undisciplined, flew each to the defence of his own. The confusion which attended upon this hasty break-up was reported to Cæsar, and he darted rapidly upon the disorganized mass. The rearguard, if such it might be called, made a brave resistance; but the numbers and skill of the Romans were invincible, and the day was spent in merciless carnage rather than conflict.

On the morrow the conqueror pushed his success further.¹ He marched upon Noviodunum, the principal stronghold of the Suessiones. Having failed in taking it by the first sudden assault, he constructed the moveable towers which the Romans used in their regular sieges, advancing them filled with combatants to the ramparts, and carrying on from them a war of missiles, under cover of which the walls were either mined or shattered by the battering-ram. These engines were hitherto unknown to the Gauls, and they soon found them much more efficient than their own rude operations. They hastened to anticipate the vengeance of the conqueror by timely capitulation. The lives of the garrison and inhabitants were assured to them at the prayer of the Remi; but Cæsar insisted upon the surrender of their arms, together with the persons of the principal citizens and of the king's two sons. The nation was then received among the subjects of the republic.

Presently the Bellovaci, into whose territory Cæsar immediately advanced, despairing of effectual resistance, courted the clemency of the invader. At the first rumour of his approach, the population had crowded into Bratuspantium, their principal fortress, with all the valuables they could remove. From hence they sent out a train of old men in the garb and attitude of suppliants. When the proconsul advanced within sight of the walls, he found them crowned with multitudes of women and children, all stretching forth their hands towards him, and signifying by their gestures the utmost fear and humiliation. Divitiacus also undertook to plead their cause. He urged the wishes of his own people for their pardon, declaring that they had formerly been faithful allies of the Ædui, and had only abandoned them at the instigation of certain evil councillors. The authors of the revolt had escaped into Britain, with which country the Bellovaci entertained close relations. The mass of the nation, being relieved from their presence, would, he doubted not, return to its duty, and thereby increase the reputation of the Ædui for influence with Rome and clemency towards their fellow-countrymen. Cæsar was not indisposed to allow his allies the credit of thus saving their ancient clients. He professed to be overcome by the prayers and arguments of Divitiacus; but, in consideration of the size and importance of this state¹, he demanded from it not fewer than six hundred hostages. When he had received these, and had seized upon all the arms he could collect, he left the country, and entered that of the Ambiani, who made their submission and met with similar treatment.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 12. Noviodunum is said to be Soissons. D'Anville; Mannert, II. i. 205.

Thus far the Belgians had done little to justify their reputation for superior valour. The force opposed to them was indeed overwhelming; but they had yielded almost without a trial of strength. But it was not so with the Nervii and their immediate allies, the Aduatuci, the Atrebates, and Veromandui. The Nervii were peculiarly proud of their German descent, and affected to despise what they termed the effeminacy of their Gaulish neighbours. According to their ideas, the only security for maintaining their national bravery was the preservation of the barbarian character in all its unsophisticated rudeness.¹ Accordingly, they forbade the introduction of foreign goods, prohibited the use of wine and other delicacies, and prided themselves on the coarseness of their mode of life. They taunted the Suessiones, Bellovaci and Ambiani with their cowardly submission, declared their resolution to maintain the struggle with their own unassisted resources, and challenged the Roman general to follow them into their fastnesses. Contemptuously rejecting the defences, clumsy as they were, which their Gaulish neighbours adopted, they erected no walled fortresses²; their dwellings were merely open villages; their places of strength the woods and marshes in which their country abounded. They sheltered their families in the impregnable islands which obstruct the outlets of the Scheldt and Meuse, while the whole flower of the nation and its allies, excepting the Aduatuci, who had not yet arrived, took up their position behind the Sabis (Sambre), in the direction in which the enemy was expected to advance.³ The Roman general was not

The Nervii and some other tribes still hold out.

¹ Cæs. B. G. ii. 4.: "Plurimum inter eos Bellovacos et virtute et auctoritate et hominum numero valere." They boasted that they could bring an hundred thousand warriors into the field.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 15.

² Cæsar describes (ii. 17.) the peculiar mode which the Nervii adopted for impeding the progress of cavalry, by forming hedges of thorns, brushwood, and the twisted branches of trees.

³ What this direction was it is impossible to ascertain with precision. Cæsar marched from Amiens; but the Nervii had no capital city for him to strike at. He would therefore seek out their army wherever it might be posted. He says that he marched three days through the Nervian territories. If this is to be interpreted strictly, it would lead him between the Scheldt and the Sambre, on the right bank of the one and the left of the other. If the Nervii placed themselves on the right bank of the Sambre, they would have abandoned their country to him entirely, nor would the barrier of the Scheldt have prevented his ravaging at least one half of it. If he directed his line of march through the country of the Veromandui, the Nervii less anxious to meet them, marching as he was at the head of one of the finest armies that had ever taken the field, consisting of eight legions, all full of confidence in their leader's fortune and their own valour. He was attended also by many of the Belgian chieftains, who publicly vaunted their zeal in his cause, while they were watching for an opportunity to desert or betray him. They secretly apprised the Nervian chieftain Bodugnatus, that the order of the army's advance was such as to invite a well-concerted attack. Each legion marched separately, followed by its long train of baggage and military engines. If the head of this winding column were boldly assailed, it might be cut off before effectual resistance could be rendered from the ranks behind. But the Belgians had not fought against the Romans long enough to understand their tactics. As soon as Cæsar learned that he was approaching the enemy, he altered the disposition of his troops.¹ Six legions now advanced in front, next followed the whole of their collected baggage, under the escort of the two legions of recent levies, who formed the rearguard on the march and the reserve on the day of battle. He selected for the site of his encampment a hill descending with a gentle slope to the Sambre. As fast as the legions arrived on the ground they were employed in throwing up their earthworks for the night's shelter. The cavalry were despatched to clear the banks of the stream of some bodies of the enemy's horse, that the troops might use their watering-places unmole-might have defended the access to their territories by placing themselves on the left bank of the Sambre, near Maubeuge; or if he crossed the country of the Atrebates, he might propose to force the passage of the Scheldt at Condé or Valenciennes. The critics have generally supposed the second of these courses to be that which he adopted.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 19.

lested. The Belgian skirmishers hereupon retreated up the opposite hill into the wood which crowned it, where their main body had already established itself under shelter and unperceived by the Romans.

While the legionaries were busily employed upon their works, the train of baggage began to gain the summit of the hill. This was the appointed signal for the ^{The Nervii surprise Cæsar's position,} Nervii to burst from their concealment in the wood. Long had they waited for it, and great had been their disappointment as they saw legion after legion take up their ground before its arrival. But when they beheld the whole Roman army standing before them they were not dismayed. They trusted in the suddenness of their appearance and the impetuosity of their charge. Cæsar was taken by surprise; it was impossible to issue at once all the orders requisite for the disposition of his numerous forces. But the admirable training of the legionaries supplied for the moment the place of generalship. Each man seemed to know, as if by instinct, what it was his part to do, and where to betake himself. The standard-bearers flew to their ensigns planted in the ground; the men flocked around them; line and battalion formed spontaneously. Though many had not time to seize their helmets, or draw off the leatheren coverings from their shields, though some of the standards were yet furled, and the hedges with which the country had been obstructed prevented some divisions from seeing the movements of the others, yet in a few minutes the whole scattered multitude was disposed in all the intricate order of Roman battle-array. Meanwhile, the charge of the Nervii had swept off the squadrons of Gaulish horse, together with the light skirmishers who had crossed the stream, hurling them back upon the right wing of the Romans, on which were the twelfth and seventh legions. On the left the ninth and tenth met the attack of the Atrebates, and, aided by the superiority of ground, repulsed their wearied and breathless assailants. The Atrebates, thus beaten from the brow of the hill, recrossed the river in confusion, losing many in its waters, the Romans pursuing them, and compelling them to renew the combat on the other side. At the same time the Roman centre, consisting of the eighth and eleventh legions, sustained the charge of the Veromandui, and confined their assailants to the strip of level ground between the acclivity in front and the river, which they had tumultuously crossed, in their rear.

The conflict was thus raging in every quarter with no decided success on either side, when a movement of the Nervii on the right suddenly changed the face of affairs. Their superior numbers enabled them to keep the Romans in check with a part only of their forces, while another division turned the enemy's flank, and rushed furiously up the hill on which the encampment was marked out. On the summit of this acclivity Cæsar's cavalry, which had been repulsed from the other side of the river, had taken breath and formed again; but the sight of the Nervii revived their former panic, and they fled a second time without a blow. Meanwhile, the sutlers and occupants of the camp, which the reserve had not yet reached, had followed the left wing in the hope of sharing in the plunder of the Atrebates, whose confusion on the first attack had appeared irrecoverable. When they now turned their heads and beheld the Nervii in possession of their works, they cried that all was over, and dispersed in every direction. At the same moment the cavalry sent by the Treviri to Cæsar's assistance, glad to believe the battle lost, left the field with precipitation, and spread far and wide the welcome news, that and carry his camp by storm.

the Roman camp was taken, and the army totally routed.

Cæsar had been himself engaged on the left wing; one moment yet remained to confirm the flagging resolution of the legions on the right, and a glance revealed to him at the critical instant the imminence of his peril. He threw himself immediately into the post of danger. He found the twelfth legion almost surrounded, and the men huddling together about their ensigns, the centurions and standard-bearers for the most part slain, despair beginning to prevail among the survivors, and fugitives escaping in numbers from the ranks. The Nervii were concentrating their dense forces all around them, and pressing the attack with inexhaustible energy. In this extremity the personal exertions of the general decided the fortune of the day. He knew that the reserve was pressing eagerly forward to his succour; but to maintain his position and prevent premature dispersion, it was necessary to gain more room for his men to use their arms, and to execute the manœuvre of turning the two legions back to back. Cæsar, indeed, well knew his duty as a general to abstain from personal exposure in combat; but on such an occasion as this he could throw off all restraint, and fight in the first rank with the meanest of the soldiery. When his men saw him thus measuring himself with the enemy hand to hand, armed with a buckler which he had snatched from a soldier of the hindmost rank¹; when they heard him encouraging their centurions by name, and acquitting himself among them as their equal and fellow, every hand was nerved with new vigour, every order he could utter was obeyed with ardour or anticipated by instinct, and a few minutes Imminent danger of the Roman army.

Cæsar fights in the ranks.

¹ Compare the conduct of Marius in the battle with the Teutones. Plut. Mari. 20.

sufficed to clear a space in which the two legions could spread their ranks and place themselves in a position for mutual support and defence.¹

Thus arrayed the Romans were able to maintain themselves, at least for a time, against the weight and numbers of their assailants. The Nervii made little use of distant missiles: they trusted to their great strength and stature, and were eager to close with an enemy to whom they held themselves personally superior. But the cool intrepidity of the sturdy legionary, with his thorough command of his cut-and-thrust sword of unfailing temper, was more than a match, man to man, for the German with his ponderous falchion, which embarrassed the slow and heavy movements of its bearer. The agile Roman, peering over the rim of his shield held close to his breast, attracted the eye of his gigantic foe, while he pierced his belly from below; and as long as he had room to use his weapons, his activity and skill in fence made him almost invulnerable. At length the reserve made its appearance on the brow of the hill, and, at the same moment, Labienus, on the left wing, having driven the Atrebates to the summit of the German position, and even occupied their camp, perceived from above the distress of his general, and detached the tenth legion to his assistance. A strong reinforcement of troops, some fresh and the others victorious, now poured exultingly upon the rear and flanks of the Nervii. The fugitives reappeared in the field, and sought by renewed exertions to efface the stain of their defection. The wounded and the dying collected

¹ Compare Suet. Jul. 62. : "Inclinatam aciem solus sœpe restituit, obsistens fugientibus retinensque singulos, et contortis faucibus convertens in hostem: et quidem adeo plerumque trepidos, ut aquilifero moranti se cuspide sit comminatus, alius in manu retinentis reliquerit signum." Also Lucan, vii. 576. :

"Promovet ipse acies, impellit terga suorum, Verbere conversæ cessantes excitat hastæ."

The Roman army is rescued by the arrival of the reserve.

their failing energies to raise themselves on their shields and hurl their arms at the enemy. Courage and confidence everywhere revived, and the victory of the Romans became at last assured. Nevertheless, the resolution of the Nervii remained to the last indomitable. They were celebrated as the bravest of the Belgians, themselves the bravest of the Gauls, and never did they better sustain their character than on that fatal day. Their eulogy is preserved in the written testimony of their conqueror; and the Romans long remembered, and never failed to signalize, their formidable valour.¹ But this recollection of their ancient prowess became from that day the principal monument of their name and history, for the defeat they now sustained well nigh annihilated the nation. Their combatants were cut off almost to a man. The elders and the women, who had been left in secure retreats, came forth of their own accord to solicit the conqueror's clemency, and enumerated the losses of their tribe. Of six hundred senators, they said, we have lost all but three; of sixty thousand fighting men five hundred only remain. Cæsar treated the survivors with compassion, allowed them the free use of their territories, and promised to shelter the scanty remnant from the malice of the neighbouring tribes.

The narrative of Cæsar, which forms an instructive and interesting guide through the whole course of his policy and tactics in Gaul, is in general so concise, and enters so little into technical details, as to foil the military critics who profess to study in it the art of war. Nevertheless, it would be difficult to persuade ourselves that in this celebrated battle, in which he ran such are routed, and their nation almost destroyed.

The Nervii

¹ The authorities for the account of this great battle are:—Cæs. B.G. ii. 19—27.; Liv. Epit. civ.; Plut. Cæs. 20.; Flor. iii. 10.; Dion, xxxix. 3.; Oros. vi. 7.

Observations of military critics on Cæsar's conduct.

imminent risk of destruction, he was not completely taken by surprise, and had failed to adopt the precautions of a consummate captain. He had sent forward his scouts in the early part of the day; and it was from some deserters perhaps from his advanced parties that the Belgians had ascertained the spot where he proposed to form his encampment for the night.¹ When he arrived on the ground he intended to take up, he still pushed cavalry and light infantry in front to clear the country before him; but these were so little in advance of him, or performed their service so negligently, as to allow a wood, apparently only a few bowshots from his lines, to conceal the whole force of the enemy assembled immediately behind it. At the same moment he allowed his troops to pile their arms, and proceed to the work of raising their entrenchments as if in perfect security. If he could not trust his Gaulish cavalry out of his sight, he should at least have taken the precaution of keeping a large portion of his forces under arms to protect the others while laying out the camp. This from his own account he would appear to have neglected, and to have trusted partly to his belief that the enemy was still at a distance, and partly perhaps to the natural defence of the river, though he admits that the stream was only three feet in depth. The rapidity of the barbarian onset was probably greater than he had anticipated; but it may be conjectured that he exaggerates the confusion in which his own forces were found, and that at least the legions of Labienus, on the left, were not unprepared for an attack.²

The remainder of the Belgian forces effected their Reduction of the Aduatuci. escape during the protracted resistance of the Nervii, and betook themselves to their several homes, each hoping that his own turn of retribution might come the last. The Aduatuci, who had not actually borne a share in the battle, were the first upon whom the Romans threw themselves.¹ Their forces were in full march to join the combined armies of their countrymen when they learned the news of the day's disaster. But they relied on the strength of their chief position, and defied the victors to a trial of arms. Deserting every village and open place, they collected the whole of their population, together with all their moveables, in one spot, the flat summit of a rocky eminence, defended on three sides by a natural escarpment, and on the fourth by a double rampart on the brow of a gentle declivity.² This tribe were the descendants of the garrison which the Cimbri had left in that part of the country in charge of their hoarded spoils before they set out on their fatal expedition to Italy.³ They had increased from a body of six thousand warriors to a population of ten times that number, of whom nineteen thousand were counted as combatants. Despising the quailing and unresisting tribes which lay between, Cæsar made directly for the intrenchment of these bolder enemies. He quietly constructed his engines of assault and his towers, with the use of which most of the Belgians were still unacquainted. The besieged collected on their walls, in the strength of which they were blindly confident, and inquired tauntingly, what was the purpose of these monstrous and cumbersome machines, and how a nation of dwarfs (for the small stature of the Italians was always a matter of derision to the northern barbarians) should move them to the assault? The Romans made no reply, but finished their preparations, and applied their mechanical forces, till the towers were seen to nod above the summit of the Belgian ramparts. The besieged declared, panic-stricken, that the gods themselves fought on the side of the invaders. They had now no other thought than how to make terms with their invincible enemy. They only entreated that, if required, as they expected, to deliver up their arms, they might be protected against their neighbours, so universal was the feeling of insecurity among the Gallic tribes, their jealousy of each other and sense of mutual injuries. This was, no doubt, the secret of the speedy dissolution of the formidable confederacy which the Belgians had formed at the beginning of the year. Cæsar gave the promise they desired, and demanded their arms. They threw down from their walls immense quantities of weapons and armour, till the heap equalled, it is said, the height of the rampart; but a gleam of hope had entered into their breasts, and they still reserved a considerable store concealed in a chosen spot. The Roman army was then admitted within the enclosure, and the place formally surrendered.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 17.

² Précis des Guerres de César, p. 45.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 29—32.

² D'Anville discovers in Falais a spot which corresponds with this description; others identify it with Namur. Mannert (ii. i. 199.) makes the country of the Eburones extend from the Scheldt to the Meuse, and places their fortress in the neighbourhood of Maestricht; while Walckenaer shows that it is most probably Tongres (Géographic des Gaules, ii. 286.)

³ Cæs. B.G. ii. 29.

Their treachery severely punished.

Having thus obtained apparently his principal object, the proconsul was preparing to quit the country, and extend his incursions into other districts. He withdrew his troops from the fortress, and passed the night in his own camp. The Aduatuci seized their hidden weapons, and made a desperate sally upon the Roman entrenchments, which they expected to find now less carefully guarded. But the vigilance of the general had not been lulled asleep. At the first approach of danger the soldiers were found at their posts, and after a furious encounter, prolonged by the conscious guilt and despair of the barbarians, the Romans were completely victorious. The next day Cæsar re-entered their stronghold without resistance, and vindicated the injured majesty of the republic by selling the whole remnant of the tribe as slaves. The remaining states now poured in offers of submission, which appear to have been accepted on easy terms. We must suppose that Cæsar exacted from them the surrender of their arms, together with sufficient pledges for their fidelity. But he abandoned to them the free possession of their lands and laws. He trusted to the gradual influence of Roman manners, to the counsels of the Roman emissaries whom he introduced among them, and to the weight of the mere name of the republic in directing the conduct of their political affairs, to familiarize them in no great length of time with a state of entire dependence.

It was probably not till after the great defeat of the Nervii, in which the whole of Cæsar's forces had been engaged, that he was enabled to detach a single legion, under the command of his young lieutenant P. Crassus, the son of the triumvir, to secure the tranquillity of the tribes inhabiting the coast of the British channel beyond the mouth of the Seine.¹ Among these were the Lexovii, the Unelli², the Curiosolitæ and the Osismii. On the southern shore of Armorica dwelt the Veneti, the most formidable of all the nations which composed the western division of the Kymric population of Gaul. These, together with the Aulerici, Rhedones, Carnutes, Andi and Turones, occupied the whole

General submission of the Belgian tribes.

Cæsar sends
P. Crassus to demand submission from the tribes in the northwest.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 34.

² Unelli, mod. Côtentin : Osismii, dep. Finisterre : Curiosolitæ, mod. Coursault, dep. Côtes du Nord : Veneti, mod. Vannes, dep. Morbihan. Lexovii is a conjectural reading for Sesuvii, an unknown name. They occupied a part of the coast of Calvados. The Aulerci belonged to Maine and the south of Normandy, the Rhedones to Rennes in Bretagne. Mannert, ii. i. 149. &c.; comp. Cæs. B.G. iii. 9. 11. 17. 29., vii. 75.

space between the lower Seine and the lower Loire, and were apparently closely united among themselves, while at the same time the traditional recollection of a common origin made them look not without feelings of sympathy upon the fate of the Belgians in the east. In the affairs of the south they took no interest, and seem to have had little acquaintance with the character of the foreign power which the Ædui had recently called into Gaul. The small force which Crassus led was sufficient to terrify them, one after another, into submission. The proconsul was satisfied perhaps with deterring them from giving aid to the Belgians, and considered the surrender of a few hostages an ample acknowledgment of his superiority. The Carnutes, the Andi and the Turones, whose countries formed the key of the whole region north of the Loire, were selected to bear the burden of provisioning the Roman army, which was quartered in their territories for the winter. Having thus secured the extensive acquisitions he had made in this successful campaign, Cæsar hastened himself to the Hither Gaul, as in the autumn preceding.¹ He took up his residence at Lucca, at the extreme frontier of his province, where he put himself in communication with his friends at Rome, and held a brilliant court of clients and dependents. The senate, however hostile and jealously disposed, was dazzled by the brilliancy of his achievements, or unable to stem the torrent of popular acclamation. It decreed a thanksgiving of fifteen days in honour of his victories, a duration exceeding that of any previous festival of the kind.

Cæsar retires to Italy for the winter.

The campaigns which have been narrated in the preceding pages, distinguished as they were by a rapid succession of hard-fought battles in the open field, suggest some remarks upon the nature of the warfare in which Cæsar and his veterans reaped their laurels. While the counsels of the Gauls were marred by manifold jealousies, and by their independent mode of carrying on the war, even after they had been brought into alliance, the Romans enjoyed the inestimable advantage of a single head to plan, and an army disciplined as a single hand to execute. The senate allowed their general uncontrolled power in the administration of his province, and the resources he could command by taxation or plunder, were generally sufficient to bring into action as many troops as he could supply or manœuvre. On the other hand, the personal qualities of the Gauls, their courage and bodily strength, were at least equal to those of their opponents; in size and stature they were individually superior, though wanting in that compactness of limb and power of endurance which at this time so eminently distinguished the natives of southern Europe.¹ As regarded the climate of the country in which the war was waged, neither side perhaps had any advantage over the other. The Gauls, indeed, fought on their own soil and under their own skies, colder in winter and more humid at all seasons than those south of the Alps. But the habits and discipline of the Roman soldier had hardened him against the exhalations of the marshes and the change or privation of food, no less than against the extremities of heat and cold. Throughout his Gallic campaigns Cæsar makes no allusion to the prevalence of sickness in his camps; and if it be true that his ranks too were recruited from the south of Gaul, yet it is worthy of remark, that the Roman legionary seems rarely to have suffered from those accidental causes of mortality which are more to be dreaded in modern warfare than the sword.¹ How much of this immunity is to be attributed to his food, his habits and his clothing, is a question which deserves more attention from the physiologist than it seems to have obtained. The absence or rarity of ardent spirits is not sufficient to account for it, inasmuch as unusual or superabundant food is hardly less detrimental to the soldier than intoxication, and the barbarian armies which entered Italy frequently melted away through careless and indulgent living. But the natives of the north have been found less capable of enduring the rigour of a severe winter than men born in a more hospitable climate.² Reared in the centre of the temperate zone, the Italians shrank from neither extreme of heat or cold. Vigorous in frame, and elastic in constitution, they bore the standards of the republic through Asia and Africa without sickening; while at this day the French are consumed by thousands in Algeria, and fevers decimate the British regiments in the East and West Indies.³

Comparison between the Romans and Gauls in a military point of view.

¹ Cæs. B.G. ii. 35.

¹ The composition of Cæsar's legions will be considered more particularly on a future occasion; his soldiers were for the most part Roman citizens of the Gallic provinces on either side of the Alps. These might be either of Roman or of Gaulish extraction. The contempt expressed by the Belgians for their diminutive stature is an additional proof of the great diversity of race among the inhabitants of different parts of Gaul.

In the field the Gauls were almost destitute of tactics or artificial resources. But while fire-arms have furnished ingenuity and discipline with irresistible weapons, the Roman method of fighting.

¹ Cæsar's troops quartered in the neighbourhood of Brundisium in the autumn of the year 705 suffered from the malaria of the Apulian coast, but these were composed, to a great extent, of recruits from the northern parts of Gaul.

² It is a well known remark that the Italian soldiers in Napoleon's Russian campaign suffered less from the cold than the Germans.

³ The compliment which Claudian pays to the grandfather of Honorius might have been applied to themselves by many of the Roman legionaries:

“Ille Caledoniis posuit qui castra pruinis, Qui medios Libyæ sub casside pertulit æstus.”—Claud. viii. 26.

barbarians before their invention were much more nearly matched with regular soldiery than in modern times. The numbers and weight of the Gaulish charge could hardly be resisted by the firmest battalions. It was usual to employ the cavalry to bear the first brunt of the encounter; but even these could seldom do more than slightly check and retard their impetuous rush. After one cast of the pilum, the legionary could only fall back upon the hinder ranks for support. He was soon pressed into the closest array by the weight of accumulating masses, and when ordered to draw his sword, could no longer wield it with freedom. With modern infantry the closer the array the deadlier is the fire of their musketry, the steadier the advanced points of their bayonets. In such an emergency the long pike of the phalanx was a formidable protection to the Macedonian infantry; but that weapon was too cumbrous for general service, and never adopted by the active and independent Roman, who put all his trust in his sword. In such cases the general relied upon his light cavalry¹, whose sudden onset and no less rapid retreat confused and distracted the enemy, and constantly broke and shivered the masses with which he came to the charge. The great peril of the Romans in the battle with the Nervii arose from their cavalry being unable to rally after their first repulse, and so to relieve the legions from the increasing pressure of the Belgian infantry. Every Roman soldier required a space of three feet on each side of him for the free movement of his arms. But when room was cleared for a moment, the legion immediately extended its front again and separated its battalions. Then each man was able once more to ply his sword, singling out an adversary, getting within his guard¹, and carving his naked body with point or edge of the finest temper.

¹ There was, properly speaking, no distinction between heavy and light cavalry in the Roman armies (Guischard, Mém. Mil. iii. 42.), but the equipment of that service would bring it generally under the latter denomination, according to our notions.

While the rank and file of the Roman legion were protected by plates of iron on the head, breast and shoulders, the Gauls were but imperfectly furnished with defensive armour, and even this they frequently rejected with the reckless and ostentatious spirit of their nation.² Accordingly, when they encountered a foe who had firmness to withstand their first shock, they had little chance of coming off victorious from the combat of man with man. The obstinacy with which they fought, and the courage with which they maintained their ground, even when they had no opportunity of returning blow for blow, only served to swell the number of the victims. The great disproportion, indeed, between the numbers slain in these battles on either side is an ordinary characteristic of ancient warfare. In modern engagements the greater part of the carnage is caused by the artillery, which may frequently be served with nearly equal precision and effect by both parties, until the superiority of one

¹ Compare Polyb. ii. 33.: Συνδραμόντες εἰς τὰς χεῖρας τοὺς μὲν Κελτοὺς ἀπράκτους ἐποίησαν Ῥωμαῖοι, ἀφελόμενοι τὴν ἐκ διάρσεως αὐτῶν μάχην, ὃ περ ἴδιον ἐστι Γαλατικῆς χρείας, διὰ τὸ μηδαμῶς κέντημα τὸ ξίφος ἔχειν. Liv. xxii. 46.: "Gallis gladii prælongi et sine mucronibus." Comp. Plut. Mar. 25.: Μεγαλᾶς ἔχρωντο καὶ βαρεῖαις μαχαίραις.

² Thierry asserts that the Gauls long resisted the use of defensive armour as an unworthy innovation. I find no express authority for this statement; but Livy (xxii. 46., xxxviii. 21.) represents the Gauls as fighting naked, and stripping themselves for the combat. In the time of Louis XIV. it was necessary to issue repeated ordinances to prevent the French officers from throwing off their armour in the field. The motive, perhaps, in both cases was partly vain-glory and partly laziness. Probably the custom of wearing armour among the Gauls did not extend beyond the nobles. Their helmets, generally the skins of animal's heads, their corslets, chain-mail, and the ornaments with which they covered themselves, are described by Diodor. Sic. v. 30.; Varro, L.L. iv.; Strabo and others. Compare Cluvier, Germ. Ant. 1.

Personal inferiority of the Germans.

being ascertained, the day is decided by the general advance of its lines. There is no reason, therefore, to doubt that the victories of the Romans over the Gauls were gained in many cases with the trifling loss which the victors themselves acknowledged; at the same time it is evident that the dead of the enemy are generally estimated upon mere conjecture, without any attempt at actual enumeration.

When Cæsar quitted the Further Gaul for his Cisalpine province, he did not leave his soldiers unoccupied. To inure them to constant exercise, to find new objects for their cupidity, to extend in every quarter the terror of his arms, these were sufficient motives for fresh and unprovoked hostilities. Some tribes about the waters of the Upper Rhone had not joined the great Helvetic migration. Their cities were still standing, their wealth, whatever it might be, was still intact. Cæsar directed his lieutenant Galba to occupy the territories of the Nantuates, Veragri, and Seduni, with the twelfth legion and a body of horse. This tract of country extended from the lake Lemanus to the highest chain of the Alps, comprehending the districts of Chablais, in Savoy, and the Valais, or valley of the Upper Rhone. The position of the Seduni may still be traced in the name of Sitten, which was perhaps the site of their principal town. Octodurus, the capital of the Veragri, may have occupied the spot where stands the modern town of Martigny, for it was considered an important position for defending the Pennine pass, which it was one object of this expedition to secure. We have seen that the ordinary route of the Roman armies into Gaul was that of the Via Aurelia, by the sea coast, sufficiently direct as long as the connexions of the republic beyond the Alps were limited to the Province and the cities of the Mediterranean, but highly circuitous and inconvenient for operations in the more northern parts of Gaul. Cæsar had on one occasion hazarded the passage of the Cottian Alps, in order to reach the Saone with more expedition ; but the experiment had served to prove the insecurity of such a route, and he might wish to command an easier and safer line of communication. The pass of the Great St. Bernard, the Alpis Pennina of the Roman geographers, was already frequented for purposes of traffic: the merchants, probably, bought off the hostility of the natives by the payment of black-mail. But the wild mountaineers were more jealous of the approach of the Roman armies to their solitary fastnesses, and were disposed to dispute with them every inch of their formidable gorges.

Campaign of Galba in the Valais Cæsar.

Galba seized upon Octodurus, which was divided into two parts, either by the Rhone or the little river Dranse. One quarter of the town he abandoned to the natives, but occupied the rest with his own forces, and proceeded to fortify it with a ditch and rampart. Thus securely posted, all he needed was provisions, and these he demanded of the natives by way of tribute. The valley in which the town lay was extremely narrow, and closely hemmed in by lofty and barren mountains, so as to produce very scanty supplies. Subsistence for an army could only be procured from a distance, and the people of the country paid little regard to the commands of an intruder whom they had scarcely seen. Two cohorts were despatched to forage, when the Gauls, taking courage from the reduced number of the garrison, assembled with all their forces on the neighbouring heights, and harassed it by repeated sallies from their fastnesses. They were the more inflamed against their invaders because many of their children had been exacted as hostages. They saw too that the pretence of opening the road was only a cover to ulterior designs, and that it was intended to retain their city in permanent occupation.

He occupies Octodurus,

The Roman general became seriously alarmed at these hostile demonstrations, for which he was unprepared. He had not yet collected sufficient stores to enable him to stand a siege, nor were his entrenchments completed. He called a council of war, in which many proposed to abandon the place at once, and cut their way, as they best might, through the multitudes augmenting around them. But the opinion prevailed that it was too soon yet to resort to such desperate measures; retreat should be reserved for the last extremity; art and discipline were meant to supply the place of efficient numbers and full preparation. This determination, however, only cost the Romans greater loss, for it was soon discovered that their defences were not sufficiently strong effectually to resist the assailants, who kept up a constant and murderous discharge of missiles upon the garrison, while they filled the ditch with stones and faggots, and hacked at the palisades and earth-works with pikes and axes. Many of the Romans had fallen, and the defence was beginning to waver; officers of approved courage pressed in the strongest terms the necessity of retreating. Galba yielded to their demands; he made a sudden sally, and the valour of his legionaries, as soon as they could grapple with the foe, threw the Gauls into confusion and drove them to a distance. But Galba, considering that he had come into the country to take up winter quarters, and not to fight, much straitened also by the scantiness of his supplies, determined to return at once into the Province, and setting fire to his camp, effected his retreat without opposition through the country of the Nantuates to the frontier of the Allobroges. Such is the excuse which Cæsar himself gave for the evident failure and discomfiture of his lieutenant.¹

but is obliged
to abandon it and withdraw his troops from the country.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iii. 1—6.; Dion. xxxix. 5.; Oros. vi. 8.

Cæsar, indeed, magnifies the check which the barbarians received into a signal defeat¹, and enumerates it among the triumphs by which his arms had been crowned, and the Gaulish nations reduced to submission.

Disturbances
in the north.
west of Gaul.
A. U. 698.
B. C. 56.
This boasted pacification of Gaul gave him the opportunity of visiting Illyricum, the further extremity of the vast tract entrusted to his care. Whatever might have been his plans in that quarter, he had not leisure to carry them into effect. The wars of Gaul were the peace of Illyricum. Suddenly in the midst of apparent security there burst forth a wide-spread sedition throughout the lately subjugated tribes of Armorica, while the aspect of affairs in other parts of the country demanded the proconsul's utmost vigilance and activity. P. Crassus was at the head of a legion quartered in the country of the Andi. Their territory was not capable of supplying him, and he despatched officers into the neighbouring districts to levy the requisite contributions. The Unelli², Curiosolitæ, and more especially the Veneti, the most powerful of the north-western tribes, were harassed by these demands. The last-named people were celebrated for their maritime power. They held many tribes of the coast in dependence, and presumed upon their skill and prowess in a mode of warfare in which they had never yet measured them-

The Veneti
seize some Roman
officers.
selves with an equal. They seized two Roman officers, threatening to retain them as guarantees for the hostages they had themselves surrendered to the proconsul. At their instigation, other tribes also laid hands on commissioners despatched to them from the Roman quarters. Having persuaded their clients and dependents to make common cause with them, they sent to Crassus,

¹ Orosius also declares that the Veragri lost thirty thousand men.

² This reading is adopted by Mœbe from the Greek version of the commentaries and the editions of Aldus and Stephanus. Oudendorp reads Esubios, from the best MSS.; but no such a name is known.

demanding the restoration of their hostages in exchange for the officers they had thus captured. Crassus himself was not strong enough to avenge this insult, but he announced it to his general without delay. The proconsul hastened to the scene of action. He determined to attack the Veneti on their own element; for their fastnesses, defended by creeks and morasses, were hardly accessible from the land. With this view he immediately ordered the construction of a flotilla at the mouth of the Loire. The rowers of the Rhone and the Mediterranean were collected for this service in great numbers. He exhorted his legionaries to embark, and declaimed to them against the perfidy of the enemy, who had violated the law of nations in seizing the persons of his ambassadors, as he chose to designate the captive commissioners. The Veneti, on their part, made active preparations to meet the attack, and invoked the assistance of the whole seaboard from the mouth of the Loire to that of the Rhine. The nations were ready at their call: the Osismii, the Lexovii, the Namnetes¹, the Ambiliati, the Morini, the Diablantes, the Menapii, all joined the great maritime confederacy. And now for the first time the name of the Britanni appears in the records of Roman history, for the Veneti drew both ships and men from the opposite coast of the channel.²

The rapidity with which the flame of resistance spread through so many nations and such an extent of country convinced Cæsar how fallacious was his reliance on the submission which had followed upon his last campaign. It was necessary not only to face the enemy in arms, but to redouble his vigilance to

Cæsar prepares to attack them with a naval force.

Their maritime power, and extensive alliances.

Cæsar takes precautions to prevent the Belgians and Aquitaniens joining the league.

¹ Namnetes, mod. Nantes; Ambiliati, mod. Lamballe, Moëbe in Cæs. Diablantes (Aulerci), the north-west corner of Maine.

² Cæs. B.G. iii. 9.

check defection in other quarters.¹ He sent Labienus with some squadrons of cavalry into the country of the Treviri, the centre of the Belgian tribes, and the quarter in which the Germans might attempt to cross the Rhine. Crassus he deputed to prevent any junction between the Aquitanians and the insurgents. Sabinus, with three legions, was commissioned to cut off the communication between the eastern and western limbs of the confederacy, and check the progress of levies among the Lexovii, Unelli and Curiosolitæ. Lastly, Decimus Brutus was appointed to the command of the great naval armament which was equipped partly from the newly constructed vessels, and partly from the barks of the Pictones and Santones, the only coast-tribes whom the pro-consul had been able to retain in subjection. This fleet received orders to steer for the shores of the Veneti, while Caesar advanced to the same point at the head of a large army by land.

The Veneti placed great reliance upon the character of their fortified positions. Mode of warfare adopted by the Veneti. Promontories and peninsulas projected from their coasts, which the tide daily severed from the main land², and upon these isolated spots their forts were generally erected. To such places it was hardly possible to lay regular siege. The Romans were wont to assail an enemy's city by advancing towers to its walls; but here the recurring tides would either render their erection impossible, or speedily sweep their basements away. On the other hand, the command of the sea enabled the garrisons to supply themselves at pleasure with recruits and provisions. If, after all, the besiegers with extreme toil pushed moles of masonry across these arms of the sea, and, from mounds raised to the level of the walls, were preparing to pour themselves into the fortress, even then, at the last moment, the galleys of the Veneti might sweep up to the gates, and carry off in an instant the garrison and the booty. The prevalence of tempestuous weather, which kept the Romans to their anchorage through the greater part of the summer, enabled the Veneti to retain their naval superiority. They doubtless owed much to their possession of the ports and their knowledge of the coast; yet Cæsar seems to admit the inferiority of his own seamen in skill and boldness. The difference in the mode of shipbuilding, and in the naval tactics adopted by the parties respectively, seemed to balance the advantages on either side. The Veneti used vessels with flatter bottoms and higher sides than those of the Romans¹; they built them also of greater strength, as men who had ample experience of the winds and waves of the Atlantic. On the other hand, their sails were clumsy and made of skins; they scarcely availed themselves of oars, and their movements were much slower than those of their rivals. But when once the two came in collision, the Venetian vessel was so firmly compacted as to withstand the stroke of the Roman's beak, and its deck so high as to place its combatants on a ground of vantage.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iii. 11.

² Cæs. B.G. iii. 12. The heppan, or stockades, of the New Zealanders are described as places of refuge on rocky points of the coast, and not as ordinary abodes.

The Romans succeeded indeed in capturing several fastnesses of the Veneti, but the whole tribe had taken to the water, and roamed freely from strand to strand. It was necessary to bring the campaign to an issue by a decisive trial of naval strength. The barbarians mustered not fewer than two hundred and twenty galleys, with which they sailed forth from the mouth of the Mor-

The Romans
gain a great naval victory.

¹ Strabo (iv. 4.) follows Cæsar in his account of this people. See also Dion, xxxix. 40—43.

bihan to meet the armament of Brutus.¹ The Roman admiral employed long poles armed with hooks to cut the sheets and shrouds of the enemy's vessels. The ponderous sails soon brought the masts by the board, and they thus became unmanageable. Others were grappled and dragged out into the open sea, where they were exposed to the repeated shocks of the enemy's beaks, impelled against them with all the force that oars could impart. If still unpierced, they were quickly surrounded by several barks at once, when the lighter-armed and more agile Romans soon succeeded in boarding and capturing them. The Gauls, finding themselves unable to cope with these various modes of attack, took to flight and spread their sails to the wind. But a sudden calm deprived them even of this last resource. The assailants, moving lightly round the unwieldy and defenceless masses, attacked them one by one, and were prevented by nightfall alone from accomplishing their total destruction. The loss of the Veneti was overwhelming. Their whole naval force had been collected together. It bore the mass of their youth, their nobility, and their senate, who had hastily embarked to escape from the advancing foe, already so near to their city as to witness the naval combat from the shore. The remnant hastened to make their submission; but they were not in a condition to demand terms, and Cæsar, acting without remorse on the ruthless principles of ancient warfare, put the survivors of the senate to the sword, and sold the people into slavery. He chose to assert that the barbarians had infringed the law of nations, and he avenged, with a fearful example, the wrongs of the spoilers, whom he styled his envoys.¹

¹ If the principal fortified place of the Veneti was the modern Vannes, it must be an exception to the choice they generally made of sites for their entrenchments. The local traditions assign the site of Cæsar's camp, from which he observed the seafight between Brutus and the Veneti (iii. 14.), to a spot between the point of Quiberon and the promontory of Rhuys (Daru, Hist. de Bretagne, i. 38.), in which case it might be supposed that the city of that people was in the immediate neighbourhood. But an ingenious essay in the Mémoires de la Société des Antiquaires, ii. 325. (an 1820), seems to prove that the city in question lay at the bottom of the gulf of Morbihan. A N.E. wind would have been favourable both to the course of the Roman fleet from the mouth of the Loire, and to that of the Veneti sallying from their spacious harbour to meet them. The calm which ensued in the middle of the day is said to be of regular occurrence in the summer after a N.E. wind in the morning. The combat took place probably off the town of Sarzeau.

Submission
and cruel punishment of the Veneti.

The campaign of Sabinus against the Unelli and their neighbours affords us some insight into the state to which the late wars had reduced the north of Gaul. On the one hand, their dread of Cæsar and their opinion of his skill and fortune were such that the nobles and senate of some tribes would not venture to second the popular cry for war.² The people rose upon their chiefs and massacred them. On the other, the country was filled with needy and desperate outlaws, men who had lost their all, or of fierce and untractable characters, ready to join or to urge any daring and sanguinary enterprise. These banditti flocked from various parts of Gaul to the standard of a people who had shown their audacity by murdering their own nobles. Lawlessness attracted lawlessness; and the camp of the Unelli was filled with a crowd of blood-thirsty savages, confident in their own prowess, and disdainful of restraint and counsel. The cautious tactics of Sabinus, who refused, as an inferior officer, to commit the army entrusted to him to an engagement without the express sanction of his commander, raised their hopes beyond measure. He calculated, probably, on the disastrous effects which must inevitably follow from the collection of these

The tribes of Normandy again subdued

¹ Cæs. B.G. iii. 16.: "Quo diligentius in reliquum tempus a barbaris jus legatorum conservaretur."

² Cæs. B.G. iii. 17.

bands of ruffians in a common cause, and was awaiting the moment when they would rush blindly upon their own ruin. The discontent, however, of his own soldiers embarrassed him more than the numbers or the ferocity of the enemy, and he was compelled to precipitate matters by sending some trusty adherents into their camp, with instructions to represent his inaction as the result of fear, and to promise them an easy victory over bands disheartened and disorganised. The Unelli fell into the snare, and rushed forth tumultuously to assault the well-defended camp of Sabinus. Breathless and exhausted with their own haste, they made but a feeble attack. The Romans repulsed them with great slaughter, and having thrown them into confusion, hurling the first ranks back upon those that followed, issued calmly from their entrenchments, and cut them down with little resistance. The Gauls thus defeated rushed from the extreme of confidence into that of despair. They yielded without another blow.

While these events were occurring in the north, ^{Campaign of} _{P. Crassus in} young Crassus, burning for distinction, ^{Aquitania.} was leading his troops into the country of the Aquitani.¹ The attempts which the Romans had hitherto made to subjugate that part of Gaul had been unsuccessful. In Aquitania a legatus had been slain a few years before with the loss of an army, and a proconsul had been driven back with dishonour. Crassus drew reinforcements from the cities of the Roman province, Tolosa, Narbo and Carcaso, ever ready to assist in extending the yoke under which they themselves bent to the neighbouring tribes, of whose liberty they were jealous. The Sotiates², ancient enemies of the republic, were the first on whom he fell. This people had learnt the

¹ Cæs. B.G. iii. 20.

² Sotiates, mod. Atre and Sots. Mannert, rv. i. 137.

Roman art of war from the conflicts they had maintained with the legions, and now defended their fortress with mines and countermines, which their practice of working their veins of copper had given them skill in constructing. But the steady perseverance of the invaders prevailed, and the Sotiates submitted to purchase their lives and property by the surrender of their arms. Their king, Adcantuannus, refused to be a party to this capitulation. He was surrounded by a handful of faithful followers, who, according to a custom prevalent in that part of Gaul, had devoted themselves by a vow to his personal service. They bore in their country the name of Soldurii¹; they were admitted to live with their chief on terms of intimacy and equality, were feasted at his table, and shared all his amusements and luxuries. In return they pledged themselves to live and die for him, to defend him as a body-guard in battle, and if he fell, not to survive him. So sacred was this vow held that no one, it was said, was ever known to have broken it. When therefore Adcantuannus declared his determination to die rather than surrender like the rest of his countrymen, this trusty band were ready to rush with him against the enemy, and encounter certain death by his side. But being easily repulsed by the superior number of his opponents, the barbarian chieftain repented of his resolve, and begged his life of the conqueror.

From this tribe the Roman general advanced against the Vocates and Tarusates², whose resources were increased by the assistance afforded them from Spain, and their confidence confirmed by the presence and counsel of many officers who had gained their military experience in the camp of Sertorius. Their tactics therefore were just the reverse of those which their countrymen had hitherto employed. They fortified an encampment after the Roman fashion, and waited for the enemy to attack them at a disadvantage, or to retire from want of provisions. Crassus found himself compelled to risk an assault, in which he met with little success. But the Aquitanians had neglected to provide sufficiently for the defence of the gate at the rear of their camp, and this omission the Romans opportunely discovered. A chosen band forced their way through the opening while the attention of the defenders was occupied in another direction, and by this seasonable diversion the position of the besieged was mastered, and their forces routed. The flying multitude were pursued by the Roman cavalry, and of fifty thousand men only a fourth escaped to their homes. This triumphant success was immediately followed by the submission of the greater part of the Aquitanian tribes. A few mountaineers alone still refused submission, secure in the strength of their fastnesses and the lateness of the season.¹

He effects the reduction of that part of Gaul.

¹ Cœs. B G. iii. 22. This circumstance is referred to by Athenæus (vi. 54.), quoting Nicolaus Damascenus, who renders the word soldurius by εὐχωλιμαῖς. Drumann, iii. 269.

² Vocates, mod. Bazadois : Tarusates, mod. Marsan. Mannert, iv. i. 133. 138.

The submission of only two nations now remained to complete the pacification of Gaul for the second time.² The Morini, farthest of mankind, as Virgil designates them³, occupied the coast of the northern ocean, from the strait to the mouth of the Scheldt. The Menapii also inhabited a land of woods and marshes on the banks of the lower Meuse. In their distant and little envied recesses these two tribes had not yet experienced the keenness of the Roman sword; but they had heard enough of the ill success of their brethren to shrink from open combat with the invaders, and resort to

Cæsar chas-
tises the Morini and Menapii.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iii. 27.: "Paucæ ultimæ nationes."

² Cæs. B.G. iii. 28.

³ Virg. Æn. viii. fin.: "Extremique hominum Morini."

the natural defences of their country, covered with impenetrable forests. After the defeat of the Veneti the summer was drawing to a close; but Cæsar, determined to inflict chastisement upon every nation, however remote, which had dared to join the northern confederacy, crossed the centre of Gaul to aim a blow at these last enemies. The barbarians hid themselves in their woods, and the impediments presented by nature were not easily overcome. The further the Romans penetrated, clearing their way before them with the axe, the more dense became the obstructions of their path, and the prospects of reducing the people more than ever hopeless. When at last the bad season set in it was necessary to recall the soldiers from their fruitless labour, and thus, at the close of Cæsar's third campaign, the only members of the Gaulish race who retained their liberty were the mountain tribes of the Pyrenees and the amphibious wanderers of the Wahal and the Scheldt. The pro-consul, as before, imposed the burden of maintaining his troops for the winter upon the last conquered of his opponents, the Lexovii and Aulerci¹, while he himself, as in the winter preceding, departed for Italy.

Leaves his army in winter quarters and returns to Italy.

¹ In Normandy and Maine.

CHAPTER VIII.

The banishment of Cicero is followed by the confiscation of his property.—His house on the Palatine, and his Tuscan villa.—Triumphant career of Clodius.—He removes Cato from Rome under pretence of an honourable mission to deprive the King of Cyprus.—Character of M. Brutus, who accompanies Cato.—Cicero's unmanly complaints.—Exertions of his friends in his behalf.—Atticus : Hortensius.—His wife Terentia.—Reaction in his favour.—Clodius disgusts Pompeius.—Election of Consuls favourable to Cicero.—He is recalled, and is received in Italy with acclamations. A.U. 696, 697, B.C. 58, 57.

WHEN Cæsar broke up his camp in the neighbourhood of Rome, and set forth upon his expedition into Gaul, he left the republic under the tyranny of a capricious multitude, which obeyed no other leadership than that of the tribune Clodius. The terror which this man had inspired among the nobles had sufficed to drive Cicero into exile. The late consul had not ventured to defend himself either by his eloquence or by the arms which were proffered for his succour. It might indeed have been possible to seize the person of the demagogue by force, to defy the clamorous imputation of sacrilege, and crush the mutinous spirit of the mob which served him. But Clodius had proclaimed that Cicero must either perish or conquer twice.¹ It was evident from these ominous words that there was another and greater power behind ; that the consuls would step

¹ Cic. pro Sest. 19. : “ Cum quidem in concione dixisset. ‘ Aut mihi semel pereundum, aut bis esse vincendum.’ ”

A.U. 696.

B.C. 58.

Pusillanimity of Cicero in retiring from Rome.

forward to protect or avenge the tribune, and, at the last moment, would be supported by the triumvirs themselves.¹ In the eyes of the multitude, however, Cicero was self-condemned by his sudden flight before he had been made the object of a distinct accusation. How many difficulties would have stood in the way of a legal attack upon him may be conceived from the fictions and evasions to which his enemy was compelled to resort in order to obtain his condemnation even when absent. On the same day that he left the city, Clodius convened the people, and caused his client Sextus to propose a resolution, in which the exiled consular was denounced by name as the author of the death of sundry citizens without form of law. By the same enactment he was interdicted from fire and water, and it was forbidden to receive or harbour him. The formula even denounced, in its blind malice, the utmost vengeance of the law against whoever should propose his recall, unless, as it declared, the victims of his tyranny should first return to life.²

In order to carry this resolution even in the popular assembly, jealous as it ordinarily was of the encroachments of the senate, and now excited and exasperated against it by artful intriguers, it was necessary to declare the decree, by which Lentulus and his associates had been condemned, a forgery.³ So audacious a proposition no one probably would have ventured to assert in the face of the orator himself. But the legality of the enactment moved by Sextus was questionable in the eyes of the Roman jurists on various grounds, all of which Cicero at a subsequent period

Difficulties that would have stood in the way of his legal condemnation.

¹ This view is set forth in the strongest colours in the speech for Sestius, 16—20.

² "Clodianorum dux" Ascon. in Pison. 8.: "Sextus Clodius familiarissimus P. Clodii et operarum."

³ Cic. pro Dom. 19.

triumphantly exposed. In the first place it was a privilegium, a law, that is, directed specifically against an individual, contravening thereby a fundamental principle of Roman jurisprudence. It was in fact nothing less than a proscription, a word still terrible to Roman ears.¹ The terms in which it was conceived were inconsistent with the fact. Sextus Clodius had proposed a resolution to the effect, not that Cicero shall be interdicted, but that he has been interdicted already; a form of language which betrays the object of the proposer to treat the condemnation of his enemy as a fact already accomplished by the previous vote of the people, instead of being, as it still was, at the moment an open question.² So again, when Clodius forbade any man to harbour his victim, he abstained from expressly pronouncing his banishment, which he might fear not to be able to carry in all the naked severity of the term.³ It was only by the blunder of Cicero's friends, who sought to mitigate the sentence by inserting a clause to limit the distance of his banishment to four hundred miles from the city, that the brand of exile was legally fixed upon him.⁴ And, once more, the accuser had not ventured to instruct the censors to strike off the criminal's name from the roll of the senate, an indignity which had always formed a part of a legal sentence of outlawry.⁵

¹ A privilegium (lex privo homini irrogata) was forbidden by the leges sacratae and by the twelve tables. Abeken, p. 118. "Quæro enim quid sit aliud proscribere." Cic. pro Dom. 17.; comp. Gell x. 20.

² Cic. pro Dom. 18.: "Non tulit ut interdicatur: quid ergo, ut interdictum sit." This interpretation of a somewhat obscure passage is maintained by Drumann, ii. 259.

³ Cic. pro Dom. 19, 20.: "Tulisti de me ne reciperer, non ut exirem poena est qui receperit, ejectio nusquam est."

⁴ Cic. ad Att. iii. 4.; Dion, xxxviii. 17.; Plut. Cic. 32. The latter writers do not coincide precisely with Cicero in their statement of the distance prescribed.

⁵ Cic. pro Dom. 31.

Nor was this all. A majority of the citizens would probably have secretly applauded, even if they durst not openly support, any one of their members who ventured to declare that the edict, such as it was, was carried, not by the unbiased voice of the people, but by a faction misled by manifest falsehood or forced by violence. The various symptoms of hesitation and self-distrust betrayed by the accuser could not fail, when skilfully handled by a consummate master of debate, to make an impression upon the assembly, and encourage it to resist the dictation of a demagogue who evinced such a want of confidence in his own cause. And, after all, it might be argued that the whole of the tribune's acts were essentially invalid, inasmuch as his adoption into a plebeian house was liable from the first to the charge of informality. Such were some of the positions upon which the orator and his friends might have maintained their ground. He required, they contended, no law to recal him, for he was banished by no legal procedure.¹

He was not banished by any legal procedure.

¹ The nature of the decree of Sextus Clodius is to be gathered principally from the speeches Pro Domo sua and Post Reditum ad Quirites. It is well known that the four orations attributed to Cicero upon his return from banishment lie under suspicion of spuriousness. Their genuineness was first questioned by Markland in the middle of the last century, assailed still more vehemently by Wolf, and has been tacitly surrendered by Orelli. As usual in such cases, it is far easier to point out internal grounds of suspicion than to establish a plausible theory to account for the existence of the speeches themselves, on the supposition of their being spurious. The objections to them, however, seem far from conclusive, and in any case their value as historical documents is little impeached by them. It is known that Cicero delivered speeches on the occasions to which they refer, and that he was well pleased with them as specimens of his oratorical powers; we may conclude therefore that they were published, and obtained notoriety in Rome. The impugners of the genuineness of the existing speeches allow that they must have been written, as rhetorical exercises, not later than the latter years of Augustus, being evidently the same as those upon which Asconius commented. It is clear, therefore, that if they are not Cicero's, the writer must have had the originals before him, and kept the facts and details distinctly in view.

Demolition of Cicero's houses.

Severe as this law was in its terms, it was not in fact so formidable as it appears. In the licentious temper of the times, none might care to respect an arbitrary act of malice, which a turn in the wheel of fortune might at any moment reverse. Possibly Pompeius or Cæsar controlled its execution from a distance, and let it be understood that the safety of the exile should not be compromised, that his friends should be treated with forbearance, and the crime of entertaining him in his banishment connived at. Cicero was well received at Brundisium, within the bounds of Italy, no less than beyond the sea. He was apprehensive of the violence of his enemy's adherents; but he had at least personally nothing to fear from the legitimate enforcement of the law. The sphere of Clodius's power was, after all, confined to Rome. Omnipotent in the forum, he ascended the Palatine hill, razed the orator's dwelling to the ground, and dedicated a portion of its site to Liberty, which of all human idols seems to have received the greatest homage from successful tyranny. His malicious object in this dedication was to render future restitution impossible. The consuls divided the spoils of the Palatine house and the villa at Tusculum, the favourite retreat of the statesman and philosopher. The tribune seized for his own share the remnant of the site of the former, which, with that purpose, he had left unconsecrated, and attached it to his own residence, which lay contiguous.¹

The demolition of a traitor's house was one of the modes by which the patriarchs of Cicero's house on the Palatine hill. Roman liberty had striven to obliterate the memory of the most odious of crimes. Such had been the fate of the abodes of Spurius Mælius and of Manlius in early times: at a later period the infliction of this indignity savoured rather of the vindictiveness of faction than the sternness of republican virtue. Cicero the oligarch could point with unseemly exultation to the retribution which the nobles had wreaked upon Vitruvius Vaccus and Fulvius Flaccus, the associates of the Gracchi, at the moment when he was inveighing against the tyranny of the cabal which had in turn triumphed over himself.¹ The house of the orator on the Palatine was the most conspicuous memorial of the deed for which he suffered. After his victory over Catilina, in the pride of his heart he had surrendered to his brother Quintus the modest dwelling of his father, and had bought of Crassus a more splendid mansion for himself, in the coveted resort of the highest aristocracy.² The fortunate consular regarded this abode with peculiar complacency. Cicero, the preserver of his country, he said, had established his household gods on the hearthstone which had been laid by Drusus the demagogue.³ It overlooked the forum and the rostra, on which the foundation of his glories had been laid. It was conspicuous in the eyes of the citizens; the person and the actions of its possessor could never escape their observation and memory. But the fickle multitude might retort that Cicero the tyrant possessed at Tusculum the abode which had been occupied by Sulla the dictator;⁴ and the impulse of the moment was gratified by the dispersion of all the ornaments and trophies which had fostered the pride and ambition of one whom they regarded as their oppressor.

¹ Cic. pro Dom. 24. 44.; pro Sest. 24., post. Red. in Sen. 7.

¹ All these cases are mentioned in the Orat. pro Domo, 38.

² Cic. ad Div. v. 6., pro Dom. 37.

³ There was a famous saying connected with this spot. When Drusus was about to erect his house there, the architect proposed a plan by which the occupant should be screened from the curious eyes of his neighbours. "Rather build it," replied the patriot, "so that every action of my life may be seen by every one." Vell. ii. 14.

⁴ Plin. H.N. x.ii. 6.

If the summit of the Palatine had been selected to keep the memory of its occupant ever fresh in the minds of his countrymen, his villa at Tusculum was his chosen spot for retirement and study. Here, also, though too far removed from Rome to be himself an object of observation, his porticoes opened upon the full view of his beloved city, from which he could never long bear to take off his eyes. From the hill on which this villa stood the spectator surveyed a wide and various prospect, rich at once in natural beauty and historic associations. The plain at his feet was the battle-field of the Roman kings and of the infant commonwealth; it was strown with the marble sepulchres of patricians and consulars: across it stretched the long straight lines of the military ways which transported the ensigns of conquest to Parthia and Arabia. On the right, over meadow and woodland, lucid with rivulets, he beheld the white turrets of Tibur, Æsula, Præneste, strung like a row of pearls on the bosom of the Sabine mountains; on the left, the glistening waves of Alba sunk in their green crater, the towering cone of the Latian Jupiter, the oaks of Aricia and the pines of Laurentum, and the sea bearing sails of every nation to the strand of Ostia. Before him lay far outspread the mighty City, mistress of the world, gleaming in the sun with its panoply of roofs, and flashing brightness into the blue vault above it.¹ The ancient city presented few towers, spires, or domes, such as now arrest the eye from a distant eminence; but the heights within its walls

¹ The effect must have been far more striking in the time of Cicero than at present, from the greater size of the city, and its extension to the south of the Capitoline. When the houses came to be crusted with marble and the roofs of the temples to be gilded, the brightness it threw into the air must have been exceedingly splendid. Rutilius, in the fifth century, gives us a glimpse of it (Itin. i. 193.):

“ Nec locus ille mihi cognoscitur indice fumo Qui dominas arces et caput orbis habet . . . ”

were more distinctly marked, and the statues of its gods exalted on pillars, or soaring above the peaks of its innumerable temples, seemed an army of immortals arrayed in defence of their eternal abodes.¹ From the bank of Lake Regillus to the gates of Tusculum the acclivity was studded with the pleasure-houses of the noblest families of Rome. The pages of Cicero commemorate the villas of Balbus, of Brutus, of Julius Cæsar; of Catulus, Metellus, Crassus and Pompeius; of Gabinius, Lucullus, Lentulus and Varro.² Accordingly, the retreat of the literary statesman gazed upon the centre of his dearest interests, and was surrounded by the haunts of his friends and rivals. It was here that, at a later period, when his fortunes were re-established, he composed some of the most abstract of his philosophical speculations;³ but even these too partook of the air of the city and the tone of practical life;

Sed cœli plaga candidior, tractusque serenus
 Signat septenis culmina clara jugis.
 Illic perpetui Soles, atque ipse videtur
 Quem sibi Roma facit purior esse dies."

¹ Silius's Vision of Hannibal in his camp on the Alban Mount, a conception worthy of an abler hand, may very possibly have been suggested by the view of Rome from this locality. Sil. Ital. Punic. xii. 707.:

"En age, namque oculis amota nube parumper Cernere cuncta dabo, surgit qua celsus ad auras, Adspice, montis apex, vocitata Palatia Regi
 Parrhasio plenâ tenet et resonante pharetrâ, Intenditque arcum et pugnas meditatur Apollo.
 At qua vicinis tendit se collibus altæ
 Molis Aventinus, viden' ut Latonia virgo
 Accensas quatiat Phlegethontis gurgite tœdas, Exsertos avidè pugnæ nudata lacertos.
 Parte aliâ cerne ut sævis Gradivus in armis Implêrit dictum proprio de nomine campum.
 Hinc Janus movet arma manu, movet inde Quirinus, Quisque suo de colle Deus"

² Orelli, Onomast. Tullianum; comp. Strab. v. 3. § 12.

³ The Tusculan villa is the spot in which Cicero laid the scene of his dialogue de Divinatione and the Tusculanæ Disputationes, and it was there, we may presume, that he composed them.

the interlocutors of his dialogues were the same men whom he had just left behind at Rome, or whom he might encounter among the shady walks around him;¹ the subject of their conversations never wandered so far from their daily concerns as not to admit of constant application to the times and illustration from them.

Clodius had taken his measures well. He relied with confidence on the support of the consuls, who, eager to reap the fruits of their office in the spoil of the wealthiest provinces, cared for no odium and foresaw no danger in maintaining the influence of the man who had promised to stand their friend with the people. The adherents of the orator, whose most generous supporters had thronged to the Capitol from the provincial towns of Italy, left the city in disgust when their favourite shrank from the contest, so that the forum was easily filled or overawed by the tribune's armed rabble. On the same day that the decree was fulminated against Cicero, Clodius brought forward another proposition for bestowing the province of Syria upon Gabinius, and Macedonia, to which Achaia was annexed, upon Piso. This measure was in direct contravention of the Lex Sempronia of Caius Gracchus², which obliged the senate to assign their future provinces to the new consuls before their election, and merely allowed the candidates a choice between them. But the popular assembly had already claimed to exercise its original right of appointment; it had gained a signal victory over the senate when it insisted upon giving Gaul and Illyricum to Cæsar; and the rival body having once surrendered at its Triumphant career of Clodius.

He assigns provinces to Piso and Gabinius.

¹ Cicero even complains that his villa lay a little out of the road: “De vium roris ἀπαρτῶσι et habet alia δύσχρηστα” (ad Att. vii. 5.).

² Cic. pro Dom. 9.

dictation a questionable privilege, dared not now resist its caprices even upon a point of strict law. This triumph over the statutes of the commonwealth encouraged the demagogue to assume still further licence. Through his influence the authority of Piso was extended over several cities within the limits of his province, to which the senate had guaranteed freedom and autonomy. Gabinius received on his part, full powers to make war upon any of the foreign potentates whose frontiers bordered upon Syria, upon the Arabians, the Persians and the Babylonians. Egypt indeed was carefully excepted from the states against which he was permitted to lead the legions of the republic. But Egypt, it will appear, was precisely the point of attack which offered the greatest temptation to the ambition or cupidity of a proconsul in the east, and it could hardly be expected that one who had profited so much by successful violence should hesitate to grasp at the only prize forbidden him.

There was yet another enemy both of Clodius and the triumvirs, the inflexible and magnanimous Cato, whom it was essential to their objects to remove from the scene of their intrigues. The means they adopted for this purpose were craftily contrived to undermine his influence by throwing suspicions upon his integrity. Ptolemaeus, king of Cyprus, was the younger brother of Ptolemaeus Auletes, who occupied the throne of Egypt. The elder had been acknowledged as the ally of the Roman people: the younger had obtained the complimentary designation of their friend.¹ No evil designs were imputed to him; the safety or tranquillity of the empire demanded no sacrifice of him; the pretence that he abetted piratical depre-

Intrigue to remove Cato
from Rome.

¹ Cic. pro Sest. 26.; Schol. Bob. p. 301. Orell.

dations was paltry as well as false.¹ But it was known that he had accumulated large treasures, and the Roman government under the guidance of two unscrupulous consuls, proposed to deprive him of his kingdom and confiscate his possessions to the public service. A Roman officer of conspicuous mark and dignity was to be sent to demand the surrender; the edict had gone forth, and no other discretion was left to the instrument of the republic than to manage the affair with violence or mildness, according to the bent of his own disposition. Of all the principal men in Rome at the time, it might be thought that to Cato the execution of an act of such glaring injustice would be least palatable. For this very reason perhaps the high-minded philosopher was selected to enforce it. It was rightly calculated in the councils of the dominant cabal that his principles of strict obedience to the will of the state would not allow him to decline the commission: but it was hoped that the acceptance of so ignoble an office under the direction of the enemies of his party would tend to lower his estimation among them. Possibly it was surmised that the handling of such a mass of treasure might have some effect in corrupting even his sturdy morality; at least it would furnish a pretext for blackening his character. The tribune accordingly brought forward a rogation to this effect, which he fortified by producing Cæsar's written approval. Pompeius was well pleased, for his own part, that the odium of the extraordinary commissions with which he had himself been charged, which he sometimes felt to be galling, should be shared by a leader of that very party which had most vehemently opposed his own schemes of aggrandisement. He considered it a master-stroke of policy thus to stay the clamours of his fiercest enemy, and he readily joined the tribune in urging the adoption of the rogation and the appointment of Cato as the commissioner.

¹ Schol. Bob. I. c. : "Quod diccretur ab eo piratas adjuvari." Clodius had a personal enmity against Ptolemaeus; for having once been captured by the pirates, he had applied to him to obtain a sum of money for his ransom. The king, it seems, sent him two talents for the purpose, and Clodius held himself affronted by the moderate value thus set upon him. It appears, however, that the pirates themselves did not consider it adequate. App. B.C. ii. 23.; Dion, xxxviii. 30.

Cato's apologists indeed aver that Clodius sent to him in the first instance, and used the softest and most flattering persuasions to induce him to accept the service. Many, he said, of the most distinguished personages of the state were already soliciting it; but it was for Cato he chose to reserve it, as the most honest and incorruptible of all, and therefore the fittest to discharge so delicate a trust. Cato, however, immediately perceived that the offer was meant, not as a favour, but as an insult and a snare, and rejected it with indignation. The tone of Clodius instantly changed from coaxing to menace, and, presenting himself before the assembly, he obtained a decree for the appointment of the refractory patriot. It was asserted that, neither ship, nor attendants, nor military force were furnished to him; every chance of failure was purposely given to the enterprise.¹ And to this service Clodius caused another, not less scandalous, to be annexed, the restoration, namely, to their city of certain persons whom the free state of Byzantium had expelled for sedition and breach of the public peace.² This combination of political

This commission is thrust upon Cato.

¹ This account is given by Plutarch (Cat. Min. 34.) Cato attained the object of his mission without the employment of force; but it is not likely that he was really left without the means. Cicero says: "Si quis jus suum defenderet Catonem bello gerendo præfecisti (pro Dom. 8.).

² Cic. pro Dom. 20.

charges was always peculiarly hateful to the cupidity of the Roman nobles, though they disguised their own selfish feelings under the pretext of patriotic jealousy.

The appointment, however, had its charms even ^{He executes it with moderation and strict integrity.} for Cato. It conferred great distinction upon a public man, who had served as yet no higher offices than those of quaestor and tribune, and who was now elevated to the rank of prætor, that this double commission might be discharged with suitable dignity.¹ It would seem, moreover, from the advice which Cato had given to Cicero, that he deemed it useless at the time to resist the combination of tyrants, and was not unwilling to embrace a specious retirement, until brighter prospects should open upon his party. Having undertaken the service, he seems to have performed it with as much forbearance as its nature admitted.² He forbore to intrude himself into the presence of the unfortunate king; perhaps he was ashamed to transact so foul a business in person. Remaining himself at Rhodes, he sent a lieutenant to deliver the decree of the Roman people, and to promise the injured monarch a rich and honourable compensation in the priesthood of the Paphian Aphrodite. Ptolemæus made no attempt at resistance; but his royal spirit scorned to descend to a private station, or accept a favour from the hands of treacherous enemies. Fortunately for Cato, as Plutarch remarks³, he preferred to embrace a voluntary death. His vacant throne was immediately overturned, his subjects placed under the rule of a Roman governor, and the fatal treasures which he had amassed poured with the strictest fidelity into the coffers of the state.¹ It would be well for the character of the most illustrious model of republican virtue if the narrative of this event could stop here; but it must be remarked that Cato, having thus performed what he might consider no more than his duty as a citizen, so far from protesting afterwards against the injustice of the decree, seems rather to have prided himself upon his mission, as redounding to his honour no less than to his advancement. As Clodius had probably foreseen, he became the defender of the acts of his patron's tribunate. He not only repudiated the excuses which Cicero afterwards suggested for his submission, but openly withstood the attempts of the orator, after his return from banishment, to fasten a stigma upon the administration of his baffled persecutor.² Nor was his zeal in defence of the author of his appointment weakened even by the insult cast upon him by Clodius in questioning the correctness of the accounts he rendered to the people, and hinting that he had abused his trust. This must have been the more offensive to Cato, as the minute and even morose strictness with which he had made his inventories and effected his sales had already disgusted and irritated his personal followers. That there was something pedantic in his dealings, and matter for not unreasonable ridicule, may be inferred from Cæsar having made them one of his principal topics of raillery in the satire upon his opponent, which he published long afterwards under the title of Anticato.¹

¹ Vell. ii. 45.: "P. Clodius sub honorificentissimo ministerii titulo Catonem a republica relegavit."

² Plut. Cat. Min. 35.

³ Plut. Cat. Min. 36.: 'Ο δὲ ἐν Κύπρῳ Πτολεμαῖος εὐτυχίᾳ τινὶ τοῦ Κάτωνος ἐαυτὸν φαρμάκοις ἀπέκτεινε.'

¹ Cato's probity was always ostentatious; comp. Vell. ii. 45, and Plut. Cat. Min. 39. As he sailed up the Tiber with his treasures, the consuls and principal people came out in procession to meet him; but he would not pause even to greet them till he had deposited his charge in the treasury. He returned from his mission A.U. 698, ὅπατρεν δὲ Φίλιππος. Plut. I. c. Appian makes an unaccountable mistake in saying that he did not actually proceed to discharge his commission till the consulship of Pompeius, A.U. 702. App. B.C. ii. 23.

² Plut. Cat. Min. 40.

While the king of Cyprus was suffering under the lawless domination of a foreign government, his brother Auletes² was experiencing the penalty of his own tyranny in the rebellion of his indignant subjects. Expelled from the palace of his ancestors in Alexandria, he bethought himself of the necessities of the rival statesmen of Rome, and determined to offer to their cupidity the temptation of interference with the affairs of his country. On his way to Italy he sought an interview with Cato. The coarse and haughty Roman treated the royal petitioner with contemptuous indelicacy, while the supple Egyptian submitted to the indignity without a murmur.³ Nevertheless, the advice of the cynical republican, who was anxious to avert another extraordinary commission, with all the cabals and fatal dissensions to which it would give rise, was sound and friendly; but the banished monarch, with all his professions of obsequiousness, had not the sense to follow it. Cato pointed out to him the insults to which he would be exposed in waiting upon the plots and counterplots of the Roman forum, the bribes that would be exacted from him on every side, the adjournment of his hopes, the exhaustion of his resources, finally, perhaps, a success more perilous to him than failure. He

¹ Plut. Cat. Min. 36. Compare the anecdote in Plin. H.N. xxxiv. 19.: "Non ære captus nec arte, unam solummodo Zenonis statuam Cypria in expeditione non vendidit Cato, sed quia philosophi erat; ut obiter hoc quoque noscatur tam inane exemplum."

² This Ptolemaeus acquired his surname from his shameless appearance in public as a flute-player. Strab. xvii. 1.: Οὐκ ὥκυεῖ συντελεῖν ἀγῶνας ἐν τοῖς βασιλείοις.

³ Plut. Cat. Min. 35.: Ο δὲ Κάτων ἐτύγχανε μὲν ὡν τότε περὶ κοιλίας πάθασιν . . . ἀσ δὲ ἥλθεν, οὔτ' ἀπαντήσας, οὔτε ὑπεξαναστὰς . . . κ. τ. λ. But such coarseness of manners has been paralleled in comparatively recent times. See Wraxall's Historical Memoirs, i. p. 252.

The king of Egypt applies for the intervention of the republic.

recommended him to return to Egypt, and make the best terms he could with his rebellious subjects ; and the monarch, who disregarded the advice, was said to have afterwards expressed his admiration of its prophetic wisdom.

Cato was accompanied on his mission by his nephew, M. Brutus, a young man of noble birth, of high and ambitious aspirations, but whose public career had hitherto been confined to serving as lieutenant to Cæsar in his government of Spain. The important part which he was destined to act in the closing scenes of the Roman republic, and the peculiar celebrity attached to his name, make us the more anxious to investigate the minuter actions of his life, and acquire a complete view of his character. He was the son of a father of the same name, who had been a prominent supporter of the Marian party, and finally lost his life by rashly joining in the enterprise of Lepidus.¹ His mother Servilia was half-sister to M. Cato, and appears to have been a woman of strong character and more than usual attainments.² So far she was worthy of her distinguished relative ; but the public voice circulated foul rumours against her, as the favourite mistress of Cæsar, the instrument of her own daughter's dishonour, the venal recipient of the spoils of conquest.³ The shocking suspicion, however, it may be here remarked, that Brutus Cato accompanied on his mission by his nephew, M. Junius Brutus.

¹ Plut. Brut. 4. Niebuhr (Lectures on Roman History, 1. 48.) denies that this M. Junius Brutus was father of the tyrannicide. But compare Orelli Onomast. Tullian.

² Servilia was married first to M. Junius Brutus, secondly to D. Junius Silanus. She was senior by many years to M. Cato. "Servilia apud Catonem maternam obtinebat auctoritatem." Ascon. in Scaur. p. 19. The Serviliæ claimed descent from Servilius Ahala, the slayer of Sp. Mælius, as the Junii from Brutus, the founder of the republic, so that the blood of the two most celebrated assertors of liberty met in the person of the future tyrannicide.

³ Suct. Jul. 50., and Macrob. Sat. ii. 2.

became the murderer of the man to whom he owed his existence is a mere invention of the Roman anecdoteists.¹ He was born A. U. 669, only fifteen years later than Cæsar himself. But Cæsar's intimacy with Servilia was, it may be presumed, a principal cause of the marked favour with which he distinguished her offspring.

The elder Brutus being cut off prematurely, when his son was only eight years of age, the care of his education fortunately passed from the hands of an intriguing mother into those of his uncle Cato; and the youth became early initiated in the maxims of the Stoic philosophy, and learned to regard his preceptor, whose daughter Porcia he married, as the purest model of practical and abstract virtue. But, together with many honourable and noble sentiments, he imbibed also from him that morose strictness in the exaction as well as the discharge of legal obligations, which, while it is often mistaken for a guarantee of probity, is not incompatible with actual laxity of principle. Accordingly, we find that while, on the one hand, he refrained as a provincial officer from extorting by fraud or violence the objects of his cupidity, he was, on the other, not the less unscrupulous in demanding exorbitant interest for loans advanced to the natives, and enforcing payment with rigid pertinacity. His base transactions with the magistrates of Salamis, as also with Ariobarzanes, king of Cappadocia, are detailed in Cicero's correspondence with Atticus. It was some years after his residence in Cyprus that he commissioned a person named Scaptius to collect his debts with their accumulated interest. He allowed his agent to urge the most questionable interpretations of the law, and to enforce a rate of interest beyond what Cicero considered either legal or equitable. Scaptius, in his zeal for his employer, obtained the services of a troop of horse, with which he shut up the Salaminian senators in their house of assembly till five of them died of starvation, being really unable to procure the sum required.¹ The bitter reflections which Cicero makes upon the conduct of Brutus mark the strong contrast between the tried and practical friend of virtue and the pedantic aspirant to philosophic renown.

¹ Plut. Brut. 5.

But neither, indeed, were the weaknesses of Cicero's own character controlled by the sage lessons he had learned and delivered. He lingered in his progress through Italy to the coast of the Adriatic, as if still indulging a hope that the passions of his partisans, whom he had left the city rather than excite to arms, might rise upon his departure in uncontrollable fervour only to be appeased by his immediate recal. But the senate cowered under the blow; the populace of Rome was devoted to the audacity and good fortune of Clodius; the states and cities of Italy, with many of which the fugitive had ingratiated himself during his long forensic career, dared not even raise their voices in behalf of the leader of a broken and dispirited party. When at last he summoned resolution to cross the sea to Epirus, it was with a burst of anger and despair, which reveals not less of pique and disappointment than of genuine sorrow. The character of this illustrious exile is fully and curiously developed to us in the very complete collection we possess of his letters at this period. They exhibit the writhings of a mind which wreaks upon friends the torments of self-dissatisfaction. The writer begins early to think he has made a false step, and to throw the blame upon those who advised, or at least did not actively dissuade him from it.²

Cicero's
unmanly complaints in exile.

¹ Cic. ad Att. v. 21., vi. 1.

² Cic. ad Att. iii. 8. and foll., ad Qu. Fr. i. 3. and foll.

Unprecedented, he exclaims to Atticus, as my calamity is, nevertheless I am not so much affected by that as by a sense of the error I have committed; for now, indeed, you perceive by whose wickedness I have been betrayed. In these words he seems to point more particularly to Hortensius, whom he might fancy to be jealous of him as a rival in eloquence; but in other places he involves his friends generally in one common accusation: Those to whom I believed my safety was dearest have treated me as the most cruel of enemies; when they saw me despond only a little, they played upon my fears, and urged me to my ruin. Nor does he spare Atticus himself, even while heaping upon him the strongest assurances of confidence. At length he works himself to such a pitch of irritation as to broach the question of suicide, and so arrays his arguments as to leave his friends under some apprehension lest his troubles should be brought to a violent termination.¹ We cannot wonder that they expressed doubts among themselves of the soundness of the sufferer's intellect.² But, without imputing to him any intentional deception, it must be allowed that Cicero, as a pleader and declaimer, had indulged so grossly in the vice of exaggeration, that he retained little power of looking calmly upon things which excited his feelings, at least of expressing himself upon them with clearness and moderation. He does himself much injustice, probably, in the over-charged picture he has drawn of his own imbecility. He might think to move the commiseration of his contemporaries by magnifying his own infirmities, but he has well nigh lost by it the respect of posterity. Some portion at least of the complaints he lavishes upon his own wrongs might well have been spared for a more frequent and prominent expression of concern at the degradation of his party and country.

¹ Cic. ad Att. iii. 9., ad Qu. Fr. i. 3.

² Cic. ad Att. iii. 13.: "Scribis te audire me etiam mentis errore ex dolore affici."

Meanwhile, the friends of the unfortunate exile, far from resenting his unjust suspicions, were stirring anxiously in his behalf. Cato, indeed, as we have seen, was absent upon a distant mission, and Lucullus had relapsed, after a short interval of activity, into the easy indolence to which he had long surrendered himself. But Quintus, the orator's brother, had returned from the province of Asia, which he had governed as proprætor, and was now conferring at Rome with Atticus, Hortensius, and the tribune Ninnius. The political history of the times makes little mention of T. Pomponius Atticus, familiar as his name is to scholars, from the confidential intercourse with which Cicero honoured him. Yet he was a man of good descent, of ample fortune, and of literary attainments¹; one who mixed freely in the society of the statesmen of the day, and was the friend of some of the most active among them. A follower, from temper as well as from reflection, of the philosophy of Epicurus, he vaunted the consistency of his life with his professions. In the most stirring age of the commonwealth, he abstained from all political action²; though closely connected with the oligarchy, he attached himself to no party; nor would he undertake the discharge of any public functions at home or abroad. He refused even the safe and easy dignities which the governors of the provinces could bestow upon the friends who followed in their retinue; nor would he employ his abilities and attainments in the

Exertions of his friends in his behalf.
Character of Atticus.

¹ He wrote an epitome of Roman history, a history of Cicero's consulship in Greek, and drew up genealogical tables of the principal Roman families. Cic. ad Att. xii. 23., ii. 1.; Nepos, Att. 8.

² Nepos, Att. 6.

career of an advocate, to which every Roman gentleman deemed himself born. He never preferred an accusation against any one himself, though such display of zeal for the public interests was the beaten road of honourable distinction ; nor would he subscribe his name to the charges promoted by a friend. He never entangled his own affairs in a suit of law. Among his numerous private friends in every party of the state each political change reduced some to peril or distress, in which to relieve them might be dangerous, or at least troublesome. Yet Atticus was not ungenerous in his care for Cicero, and afterwards for Brutus ; while at the same time he succeeded in divesting his sympathy of any political colour, and escaped the animadversion of their enemies.¹ This indeed was in later life, when his character for neutrality was securely established ; and it deserves to be remarked, that the factions of Rome were always extremely tolerant of neutral parties. At an earlier period, however, the fact of his connexion by blood with P. Sulpicius subjected him to the jealousy of Cinna's followers, and compelled him to leave Rome and seek an asylum at Athens.² There he continued to reside for many years, and his avowed attachment to the spot, and interest in its fame and fortunes, obtained for him the surname by which he is familiarly known. The leisure which Atticus secured by this renunciation of all public employment he devoted chiefly to the cultivation of arts and letters. Nevertheless he was shrewd and keen in the pursuit of wealth, though far from illiberal in the use of his treasures. Ample as was the patrimony he inherited, the lessons of wisdom could not restrain him from devoting both time and care to improving and increasing it. He possessed a large family of slaves, whom he imbued with various accomplishments to enhance their value; he lent money on the most approved securities, especially to the corporations which farmed the revenues; and we read of his purchasing a troop of gladiators in order to let them out to magistrates for public games.¹ The friend of Sulla, of Cicero, of Brutus and of Agrippa, Atticus outlived several generations of contemporary statesmen. At the age of seventy-seven he was attacked by an incurable disease, and then, true to his principles, he submitted to voluntary death by abstinence, rather than encounter the only ill for which his master could furnish no remedy. He died in the year of the city 722.

¹ Nepos, Att. 4. 8.

² Nepos, Att. 2.

We have already acquired some knowledge of Q. Hortensius, in reviewing the character of the more refined and luxurious class of the Roman nobility. Born eight years before Cicero, and entering the arena of the forum at the age of nineteen, his florid rhetoric and graceful delivery had already established his fame before the period of Sulla's ascendancy.² At the first introduction of his future rival into public life Hortensius was in complete possession of the ear of the judges. Attached as he was to the cause of the oligarchy, he continued from that time to exercise his talents chiefly in defence of the statesmen of his party accused of provincial malversation. He pleaded before favourable tribunals; and this circumstance doubtless contributed far more than his eloquence to his boasted successes. The prosecution of Verres, in which he was retained by the defendant against the rising genius of Cicero, first shook the supremacy of this champion of the bar. But Hortensius felt no remorse at reflecting that the immense wealth procured for him by his abilities was for the most part derived from the plunder of the provinces. Though unstained by glaring vices, his career was equally unmarked by any elevation of view or the expression of any generous sentiments. Accomplished as he was, he made no progress in the affections of the simpler mind of Cicero. After passing through the usual succession of public offices, he obtained the consulship in the year 684. His ambition was thenceforth satisfied; nor did he even exert himself to retain the high position he had acquired. The example of his indolence and luxury made him rather a burden than a support to the sinking cause which he still nominally maintained, and he gradually lost whatever esteem a Cato¹ and a Cicero may have once bestowed upon him. The latter lived indeed to retract his insinuations against him of want of fidelity to himself²; but if he failed to the last in exhibiting any cordiality towards him, we may feel that he had better grounds for his coldness than a mere remnant of professional jealousy.

¹ Cic. ad Att. iv. 4.; Nepos, Att. 13.

² The redundant and florid character of this orator's eloquence is criticised with delicate depreciation by Cicero (Brutus, 94, 95.).

The first duty of the exile's real friends undoubtedly was to provide for the security of his wife and family, whom, uncertain regarding his own movements, he had left behind him at Rome. This was a sufficient reason for Atticus to neglect his friend's entreaties to meet him at Brundisium or in Epirus, where an interview could have been of no service to Cicero's true interests. Not indeed that there was much actual danger to a woman abandoned by her legitimate protector, even in the midst of his political enemies. The Roman women in the olden times had been bred on a system which disabled

¹ Aristocrat though he was, Hortensius was held in little favour by the later admirers of Cato. Perhaps it was natural to contrast two such dissimilar characters. Comp. Lucan, ii. 329.:

“Quondam virgo toris melioris juncta mariti.”

² Cic. pro Sest. 16—19.

Political nullity of the Roman women, and their consequent security in times of revolution.

them from taking any part in politics. Their proper sphere was deemed to be merely domestic, and the cultivation of their intellectual powers was rejected as superfluous or dangerous. With the advance of civilization the manners of antiquity relaxed; the Roman matrons, the Cornelias, the Porcias and Aurelias, became not unfrequently the counsellors of their husbands and the instructors of their children; but it was only the looser sort, the Fulvias and Clodias, who mixed in the political intrigues of their gallants. The idea still remained rooted in the Roman mind that the wife was the dependant, almost the slave, of the pater-familias, and could occupy no place in the arena of public life. Hence it was that, amidst the revolutions and proscriptions of the civil wars, the females of a family were never subjected to the persecutions in which their husbands and brothers were involved. The parent of Sertorius remained unmolested in Rome throughout the wars which the republic waged against her son. After the death of Caius Gracchus, his mother Cornelia retired only to Misenum, and there abode in the enjoyment of ample fortune and the most distinguished society¹, while the son of Fulvius, a youth of only fifteen years, was involved in the proscription of his father.² Nevertheless, the situation of Terentia, the wife of Cicero, demanded the solicitude of his friends. The confiscation of her husband's fortune reduced her at once to poverty. She was a woman of high spirit, and acted with fortitude and decision. We possess a letter of Cicero's, in which he entreats her not to dispose of a small estate, her own property, by the sale of which she was preparing to provide for the immediate neces-

High spirit of
Cicero's wife, Terentia.

¹ It may be remarked, as an exception to this contemptuous generosity, that Licinia, the wife of C. Gracchus, was deprived of her dowry. Merimée, i. 81. note.

² Plut. C. Gracch. 17. 19.; Vell. ii. 7.

sities of her household. He represents the injury that she will thus inflict upon their son, and counsels her to trust to the benevolence of Atticus and the pious attention of Piso, their son-in-law.¹ In a short time ample provision was made for the wants of the family; and Terentia combined with her husband's friends in watching the tides of public opinion, and working with zeal for his restoration.

The vices and insolence of Clodius were already contributing to the advancement of Cicero's cause; by the one the affections of the people were in some degree alienated from their unworthy favourite, by the other even Pompeius felt himself at last aggrieved. The exile had meanwhile retired to Thessalonica. Southern Greece, to which he would more willingly have betaken himself, was infested by the presence of certain of Catilina's adherents, among whom he deemed it unsafe to venture his person.² But when the year was about to expire, and Piso, the late consul, was preparing to visit Macedonia, his allotted province, the fugitive entertained no less apprehension from the proximity of so bitter an enemy. Presently the country began to fill with the troops and officers of the new proconsul.³ Any violence done by them to the banished man would, he feared, be regarded with indulgence, if not with favour. Cicero felt it necessary to expedite his departure, and he determined, by approaching nearer to Italy, to give a token of his own courage, and animate the exertions of his friends. Accordingly, he took up his residence at Dyrrachium, although it was within the prescribed limits of four hundred miles from Rome, and lay on the high road to Macedonia. He had numerous partisans in the country.¹ The magistrates and people of the city were both kindly disposed towards him, and jealous of their own liberty.² In the midst of some real, and much imaginary danger, he relied on the spirit of this free state for protection; so much had the citizen to fear from illegal violence, in the lawless condition both of Rome and the provinces; so much might he hope, even in opposition to the law, from personal and private regard; such, in short, was the weakness of the metropolitan government in the dependent communities over which it claimed to be paramount.³

¹ Cic. ad Div. xiv. 1, 2.: "Quod ad me scribis te vicum venditum, quid, obsecro te, me miserum, quid futurum est? . . . per fortunas miseras vide ne puerum perditum perdamus . . . obsecro te, mea vita, quod ad sumtum attinet, sine aliis, qui possunt, si modo valunt, sustinere."

² Cic. pro Planc. 41.

³ Cic. ad Att. iii. 22.

The elections for the ensuing year had already proved favourable to the prospect that the decrees against Cicero would be speedily reversed.⁴ This was chiefly owing to the sudden change in Pompeius's disposition towards Clodius. When the victorious general returned from the East, he had brought with him a son of Tigranes, king of Armenia, whom he kept in the custody of Flavius, one of the prætors, as a hostage for his father's good faith. Clodius had obtained possession

Pompeius
turns against Clodius,
B.C. 57.

¹ Cic. ad Div. xiv. 1.: "Dyrrhachium veni quod et libera civitas est, et in me officiosa et proxima Italiam." Comp. xiv. 3.: "civitas hæc semper a me defensa est."

² Pliny (H.N. iii. 23,) calls Dyrrhachium a Roman colony, but the great importance of the place as an emporium of commerce had given it probably the means of claiming autonomy. It had been famous for its hospitality to strangers, from whence it may have derived its ancient name of Epidamnus (sc. ἐπιδημεῖν). See Perizon. ad Aelian. V.H. xiii. 16. There was a popular story that the Romans changed the name to Dyrrhachium (sc. δύς and ρχία), "Ominis causa, quasi in damnum ituri." Mela, ii. 2.

³ When Caesar proposed to consign the Catilinarian conspirators to the custody of Italian municipia, Cicero remarked: Habere videtur ista res iniquitatem si velis, difficultatem si rogas: in Catil. iv. 4

⁴ The elections had taken place at the usual time in the summer of 696. Cicero at Thessalonica speaks of the tribunes designate in a letter of the fifth of August: ad Att. iii. 13.

of this youth's person by fraud, and refused to deliver him up on the prætor's demand. Soon afterwards he accepted a bribe from the Armenian monarch, and sent him home. Flavius set forth with a body of armed men to overtake him; but at the fourth milestone he was met by the tribune, attended also by a troop of partisans.¹ A combat ensued, in which Clodius was successful, killing several of his opponents, and among them one Papirius, a knight, a publicanus and a friend of ^{Violence of} the tribune. Pompeius.² Thus outraged and insulted, the great man withdrew his countenance from his upstart creature, and determined effectually to check him. It was reported indeed that Clodius had contrived a plot to assassinate the triumvir. All the circumstances requisite to substantiate the report were vouched for: one of the tribune's slaves was seized at Pompeius's door; he had a dagger upon him; he confessed that he had been placed there by his master to commit the murder.³ This suspicion, coupled with the violence of the mob which surrounded the tribune's person, induced Pompeius to retire from public view and confine himself to his own house. Even there he was assailed by the populace, and in the riot which ensued the consul Piso openly took part with Clodius. Pompeius succeeded in detaching from him the other consul Gabinius, and by exerting all his influence, joined probably to that of Cæsar, who was also induced to abandon the demagogue⁴, he obtained the election to the consulship of Lentulus Spinther, a decided friend to Cicero, and of Metellus Nepos, an adherent of his own, whose per-

^{Election of} consuls friendly to Cicero.

¹ Dion, xxxviii. 30.

² Cic. pro Mil. 14.; Ascon. in loc.

³ Cic. pro Sest. 32.; Plut. Pomp. 49.

⁴ Cic. ad Att. iii. 15., written in the middle of August: "Varronis sermo facit expectationem Cæsarum." Soon afterwards Sestius, a private friend of Cicero, whom he defended subsequently in the ener-

sonal enmity to the exile he could control and modify. The new tribunes also were now for the most part favourable to the interests of Cicero and of the senate.

The consuls commenced their career by moving the question of the orator's recal. They were baffled in the first instance by the veto of Serranus, one of the tribunes.¹ A second attempt issued in a furious and bloody tumult excited by Clodius, and carried through by the armed clients and paid adherents by whom he was constantly attended. Rome was abandoned for an instant to brute violence. Clodius, blind with rage, set fire with his own hands to the temple of the Nymphs, and consumed the registers of the censorship; he attacked the houses of the principal nobles, and filled the forum with the corpses of the slain. Such a scene had not been witnessed within the walls since the contest of Cinna and Octavius.² At last Annius Milo, on the part of the senate, collected a body of gladiators under arms, and patrolled the streets to prevent his opponent's followers from assembling; nor did the gravest of the nobility scruple to acknowledge his assistance, and applaud his spirit in undertaking their defence at his own private charge.³

The senate had now made up its mind to proceed to any extremity. It issued a decree, inviting the Italian citizens to come to the defence of the commonwealth, and overawed

Cicero is recalled from exile, and returns to Rome.

getic speech from which so much of our knowledge of these events is drawn, made a journey into Gaul on purpose to confer with the pro-consul, and obtain his approval of the exile's recal, though coupled apparently with some conditions or expressions unpalatable to him (pro Sest. 32.).

¹ Cic. pro Sest. 34.

² Cic. pro Sest. 35—38.

³ Cic. de Off. ii. 17. : "Honori summo nuper nostro Miloni suit qui gladiatoribus emptis reipublicæ causa omnes P. Clodii conatus furoresque compressit."

the urban population.¹ Rome was speedily filled with the adherents of Cicero and his party; while every city, it was said, throughout the Peninsula, hastened to testify by some public act or monument its regard for the saviour of his country, the patron of so many states and towns of Italy. Nevertheless, the forms of the constitution gave such obstructive power to the factious and unscrupulous, that Clodius still contrived to suspend for several months the carrying of a law for his restoration. The refractory tribunes, through whose vetoes he acted, for he had ceased to belong to the college himself, saw themselves gradually deserted by all their principal supporters, and were at last bought off or wearied out by the inflexible determination of the senate. It was not, however, till August that the law was finally passed², and early in September the exile reappeared in the city, after an absence of sixteen months. He had advanced almost in a triumphal procession the whole length of the Appian way: Italy, it was said, had borne him on her shoulders, and carried him into Rome. He was received on the Capitol with such acclamations as had rarely fallen to the lot of the greatest conquerors³; happy above his patron Pompeius in the fortune which, by unmerited reverses, had already revealed the vanity of the applause which greeted him.

¹ Cic. post Red. in Sen. 9., pro Sest. 60.: "Ut literis consularibus ex senatus consulo cuncta ex Italia omnes qui rem publ. salvam esse vellent convocarentur."

² Cic. ad Att. iv. 1., prid. non. Sext. i.e. Aug. 4. The Roman people never voted with such unanimity as on this occasion. Plut. Cic. 33.: καὶ λέγεται μηδέποτε μηδὲν ἐκ τοσαύτης δμοφροσύνης ἐπιψηφίσασθαι τὸν δῆμον.

³ Cic. post Red. in Sen. 15., pro Sest. 63., in Pison. 22.

CHAPTER IX.

Pompeius obtains an extraordinary Commission for supplying the City.—Application of the King of Egypt to be restored to his Throne.—Intrigues of the Nobles in relation to it.—Violence of Clodius.—The Triumvirs confer together at Lucca.—Pompeius and Crassus elected Consuls in spite of the Opposition of the Nobles.—Spain and Syria decreed to them, and Cæsar's Command prolonged for a second term of Five Years.—Pompeius' Theatre and Shows.—He remains in Italy, and governs his Province by Legates.—Cicero reconciled with Crassus—Gabinius restores the King of Egypt.—He is impeached, attacked by Cicero, but acquitted: Again accused on another charge, defended by Cicero, but condemned and banished.—Cicero courts the Triumvirs.—Corrupt proceedings of the candidates for the Consulship.—Paralysis of the Constitution.—Death of Julia, and reflections on the political importance of that event (A.U. 697—700, B.C. 57—54).

THE wealth and influence of the aristocracy might have succumbed in a contest with the representative of the mob of Rome, had it not armed itself with weapons from his own workshop, and turned the arts of the demagogue against himself. The nobles had adroitly availed themselves of the occurrence of a scarcity, perhaps they had even contrived it, to inflame the passions of the multitude against the champion it had deemed omnipotent. On the very day upon which the law was passed in favour of Cicero's recall, a sudden fall was remarked in the price of corn. The partisans of the banished man hailed this circumstance as a manifest token of divine approbation.¹ True it was that the markets rose again almost immediately; but Cicero had the tact

Appointment of Pompeius to an extraordinary commission for provisioning
the city.

Sept.
A.U. 697.
B.C. 57.

¹ Cic. pro Dom. 5, 6.

to draw advantage in another way from this reverse also.¹ Being now reinstated in his position, and, to a certain extent, in the influence he had formerly enjoyed in the counsels of the nobility, which he was anxious to fortify, he seized this pretext for proposing the appointment of Pompeius to an extraordinary commission for supplying the city. This was a recurrence to the principle of the Gabinian and Manilian laws, both of which the leaders of the senate had resisted and denounced. But the republic had now become familiarized with these monopolies of power, which so lately had shaken it with alarm. It conceded, for the third time, indefinite and arbitrary powers to a personage, whose influence in the state was already greater than that of any of his competitors, perhaps even than that of the state itself. It authorized him to demand supplies from any part of its dominions, at prices to be fixed at his own discretion²; and to enable him to carry out his measures, it invested him with the command of troops, and every other resource he might deem necessary. He received the sole appointment of fifteen commissionerships, posts of lucre and dignity which the principal men of Rome might covet. Cicero himself accepted one, though he does not appear to have taken any part in the administration of the affair³. The populace, looking to this measure for its immediate relief, clamorously invited it, and the senate offered no steady opposition.¹ The appointment was decreed for a term of five years; and its secret opponents were contented with discountenancing certain extravagant provisions which Messius, a flatterer of Pompeius, proposed to annex to it. The triumvir found himself compelled to disclaim any wish for the dictatorial power in the provinces, which his creature's rogation would have conferred upon him², and the bill passed the popular assembly in a less obnoxious form than might have been apprehended from the strength of his party and the reckless impatience of the multitude.

¹ Dion, xxxix. 9.; App. B.C. ii. 18.; Plut. Pomp. 49. The Clodian party took this opportunity of throwing the blame of this rise upon Cicero, whose friends had filled the city with strangers to secure his recal. Cicero was thus driven to promote Pompeius's interests in his own defence. Clodius therupon attacked Pompeius as the real author of the famine. Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 3. We may believe with Drumann, that it was the latter who caused an artificial scarcity, with the view of extorting an extraordinary employment.

² Cic. ad Att. iv. 1.: "Legem consules conscripserunt quo Pompeio per quinquennium omnis potestas rei frumentariorum toto orbe daretur."

³ Quintus Cicero was employed by Pompeius in the execution of the office (Cic. pro Scaur. 2. 39.) Drumann supposes that Marcus resigned his commissionership in favour of his brother. (Gesch. Roms. iv. 511.).

The senate was determined to follow up with energy its victory over the public enemy. That august body had listened to the speeches of Cicero on his return with commiseration, the people with shame and contrition. All possible reparation was to be made to the injured patriot. The site of his house on the Palatine was restored to him, cleared of the new buildings which Clodius had begun to erect upon it, and relieved from the effect of the act of consecration, which was now disregarded as informal.³ Sums of money were also voted to him in compensation for his pecuniary losses.⁴

Hostile attitude of the senate towards Clodius.

¹ Cic. ad Att. iv. 1.: "Senatus frequens et omnes consulares nihil Pompeio postulanti negarunt."

² Cic. l. c.

³ Cicero, in his speech Pro Domo apud Pontifices, states the reasons why the act of consecration should be pronounced invalid. The college of priests would go no further than to declare that if the circumstances were such as he represented, the act would be vitiated; but the senate was satisfied with this qualified sentence, and proceeded to vote accordingly.

⁴ The compensation for the Palatine house was fixed at HS. vicies, something less than 18,000*l.* of our money, valuing the sestertium at 8*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.*, that of the Tusculan quingentis millibus, or nearly 4,500*l.*, of the Formian at half that sum: "Certe valde illiberaliter." Cic. ad Att. iv. 2.

The next object was to institute proceedings against the demagogue for the violence and illegality of his conduct. The validity of his original election to the tribuneship he had so abused might be brought into question, for high authorities pronounced the mode of his adoption into a plebeian house illegitimate. The establishment of this point would cut up the very roots of his power, by the summary reversal of all his official acts. But it would be difficult to carry so sweeping a censure in the teeth of the various methods of obstruction which a crafty opponent could employ in his defence. While Cicero urged on the prosecution, and Cato, lately returned from Cyprus, stood forward to repel it, the movements of the body of the senate were languid and distracted, and the apprehensions excited by the mob which filled the streets and menaced the assembly deterred it from pressing the matter to a decision.¹ It was soon found, indeed, that even the pursuit of a common enemy was not a matter of interest sufficiently intense to subdue the private jealousies of a triumphant faction. The king of Egypt, Ptolemæus Auletes, of whose suit

It is diverted from its purpose by the application of the King of Egypt for restoration to his kingdom.

to the Roman people mention has been already made, had now arrived in the city, and was besieging the doors of the political chiefs with applications to befriend him.

A new and most important commission was in view; to whomsoever it fell, it would confer upon him, as the Romans phrased it, an increase of personal dignity; it would extend his influence among the lower orders, which still regarded the honours and titles of illustrious families as claims to their support and suffrages. Moreover, the discharge of such offices presented manifold ways of amassing treasure; there were outfit and salary to be expended, presents and bribes to be hoarded in the coffers of the family, or distributed among friends or opponents. Such a commission would require a military force for its execution, and thus confer power and influence, and the means of providing for dependents. For a moment all other party interests were abandoned, and political leaders rushed together into the arena to compete for this brilliant preferment. In the first instance the consuls of the year were authorized, by their exalted position, to propose that the charge should devolve upon one of themselves, upon him, namely, who should obtain by lot the province of Cilicia, which lay opportunely for an expedition to Egypt. Cilicia fell to Lentulus, Spain to Metellus. Lentulus was preparing to set out for his province, when one of the tribunes, C. Cato, produced an alleged oracle from the Sibylline verses, to the effect that the king must not be restored with a multitude; a phrase which was deemed to prohibit the employment of an armed force. The power of levying an army was one of the principal advantages which the commission held forth; but the influence of Rome in Egypt was so great that the object, it might be presumed, could be easily effected by the representations even of an unarmed ambassador. The oracle was doubtless a forgery for political objects: but the people were swayed blindly by superstitious terrors, and no one ventured to trifle with their prejudices. Cicero, even in a familiar letter, speaks of the divine interference with bated breath. In the senate it was generally deemed an opportune fiction; yet, in the discussions which ensued, its genuineness seems never to have been called in question.¹ The prediction appears indeed to have sunk deeply into the minds of the nation; the fate of Pompeius, when he was afterwards murdered on the shore of Egypt, was attributed to his neglect

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 1.

The Sibylline oracle prohibits an armed interference.

¹ Cic. ad Div. i. 1., in a letter to Lentulus.

of its warning, in venturing merely to land upon the beach and seek an asylum for his broken army.¹

Lentulus did not wait till the question regarding the commission was settled, but departed for his province as soon as he had descended from the consul's chair. Installed in his government he awaited the result of these lagging deliberations. In accordance with the provisions of the bill which had already received the requisite sanctions, Cicero would have consented to his retaining the commission, but would have withheld from him the military force. Others considered the whole matter as open to fresh discussion. Crassus proposed the appointment of three legates. Bibulus required that the three should be personages of inferior dignity. Volcatius and Afranius, friends of Pompeius, and others who were won over by the intrigues of the royal petitioner², would have conferred the office on the great commander alone. Servilius, one of the gravest and noblest of the senate, declared the commission altogether inexpedient.³ Thus split into various sections, the senate exposed itself again to the attacks of its bitterest enemy. Clodius succeeded in obtaining the ædileship, while his friends, affecting to support the proposal of Crassus as adverse to Pompeius, used every endeavour to widen the breach between them.⁴

¹ Lucan, viii. 824.:

“Haud euidem immerito Cumanæ carmine vatis Cautum, ne Nili Pelusia tangeret ora
Hesperius miles, ripasque æstate tumentes.”

² Cic. ad Div. l. c.: “Regis causa si qui sunt qui velint, qui pauci sunt, omnes rem ad Pompeium deferunt.” The Egyptian king employed intrigue and corruption, and even violence, to effect his object. He is said to have caused the ambassadors, whom the Alexandrians sent to confront him at Rome, to be waylaid and murdered on their route. Dion, xxxix. 13.; Strab. xvii. 1.

³ Cic. l. c.

⁴ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 3.; “Who is it that starves the people?” exclaimed Clodius. “Pompeius!” shouted his followers. “Who

Great heats occasioned by the competition of the nobles for this commission

A. U. 698.
B. C. 56.

The triumvirs, regardless of their common interest, could no longer dissemble their mutual jealousy. Pompeius openly accused his associate of designs against his life, while Crassus thwarted with vigilant activity every scheme for his rival's aggrandisement. Obscure as were the sources of the power which Crassus wielded, every day proved how deeply it was seated, and how great was the weight of the moneyed class by which he was principally supported. The result of a series of petty intrigues gradually narrowed the contest to one between Pompeius and Lentulus, but the increasing violence of the popular demagogues made its decision impossible.

The city became once more a prey to internal tumults. The nobles began to collect their retainers from the country to protect their champion Milo.¹ The Clodians, unable to repel force by force, appealed in their turn to the tribunals, and impeached him without success. The tribune, C. Cato, however, persisted in harassing the senate with factious motions before the popular assembly. The statue of Jupiter on the summit of the Alban mount was struck by lightning², a portent which excited a general panic, and raised a cry for rescinding the appointment of Lentulus.³ A bill was even proposed to recal him from his province⁴; but the consuls interfered by taking the auspices on the days of meeting, and thus vitiated the pro-

Violence of Clodius and Milo.

wants to go to Alexandria?" "Pompeius!" they shouted again. "Whom do you wish to send?" "Crassus!"

¹ Cic. l. c.: "Operas autem suas Clodius confirmat. Manus ad Quirinalia paratur: in eo multo sumus superiores ipsius copiis. Sed magna manus ex Piceno et Gallico exspectatur, ut etiam Catonis rogationibus de Milone et Lentulo resistamus."

² Dion, xxxix. 15. This was in January, or early in February, A.U. 698.

³ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 3.

⁴ Cic. l. c.; ad Div. i. 5.; "C. Cato legem promulgavit de imperio Lentulo abrogando."

ceedings.¹ The wheels of the constitution were locked.

By getting himself elected ædile, Clodius had for the present averted the danger of judicial impeachment. The influence he still continued to wield at this crisis, bankrupt as Pompeius is anxious to obtain the consulship. ⁴⁴ he was in character, and destitute of the ordinary resources of great party leaders, must be referred to the secret support he received from personages of more importance than himself. Pompeius indeed had cast him off in a fit of spleen ; yet the ends for which the triumvir was secretly working could only be realized through the confusion to which the demagogue's proceedings were obviously tending. The senate had displayed more resolution than he expected ; the state was not yet ripe for falling quietly under his domination. He now bitterly regretted having divested himself of his military command ; the charge of supplying the city had been denuded of that which constituted its greatest charm, the authority to levy troops. The senate had outwitted him by a specious gift, which added much to his unpopularity, and little to his strength. The more recent prospect of a command in Egypt had been frustrated. There was only one way left to recover the position which he had relinquished, and that lay through the consulship. The consuls for the year just commencing were men of more than common resolution ; such at least was Lentulus Marcellinus, and his superior force of character carried Marcus Philippus, his colleague, along with him.² These were not the men to surrender the advantage which their party had gained by the reversal of

The consuls vigorously oppose his views.

¹ Cic. ad Div. ii. 6. : "Consul dies comitiales exemit omnes. C. Cato concionatus est, comitia haberi non siturum, si sibi cum populo agendi dies essent exempti."

² Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 6. : "Consul est egregius Lentulus, non impudente collega."

Clodius's infamous law ; on the contrary, they were already putting forward, as a candidate for the next consulship, L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a brother-in-law of M. Cato, inspired by his connexion, if not by his own temper, with the deepest hatred of the triumvirs. Domitius openly declared that his first act in office should be to propose Cæsar's recal from his province, and he was actuated no doubt by a similar spirit of hostility towards Cæsar's allies. The danger indeed touched the proconsul more nearly than either of his associates : for to him the deprivation of his command would be something much more serious than a mere temporary frustration of his ambitious projects. It would be no less than a summons to appear before his enemies at Rome, unarmed and defenceless. The moment he should descend from power, banishment or even death, in all probability, awaited him. Cæsar's position was, indeed, exceedingly critical. The reversal of the sentence on Cicero came too soon for his policy. He had assented to it with reluctance. It had been extorted from him by the impatience of Pompeius ; for he had doubtless looked to the continuance of Clodius's ascendancy until he could obtain certain further concessions from the terrified senate. By means of this instrument on the tribunitian bench, he hoped to have driven the nobles to consent to an extension of his term of command, with ampler powers and more abundant resources. All this was absolutely necessary for the full development of his design to raise himself to a position in which he might defy his enemies ; and in this view he continued, we must imagine, to support Clodius even after Pompeius had withdrawn his countenance from him.

The proconsul of Gaul was never more actively engaged than during the intervals between the campaigns by which his attention was

Cæsar arrives at Lucca, and is waited upon

by great numbers of senators and knights. for the time engrossed. After the apparent submission of the Transalpine nations in the autumn of 697, he had betaken himself to the Hither province, where he had two objects in view; the first, and the more ostensible, was to convene the national assembly of the Cisalpine communities, through which he regulated the internal affairs of his government, levied contributions, and recruited his legions; the second was to confer with the friends whom he had left in the city, who flocked to him at Lucca¹, bringing in their train political agents of every shade of party, spies, enemies and admirers. Consulars and officials of every grade thronged the narrow streets of a provincial watering-place. A hundred and twenty lictors might be counted at the proconsul's door, while two hundred personages of senatorial rank, nearly one half of the order, paid their court at his levees.²

The genius of the popular champion was never unequal to the opportunities which fortune presented to him, and seemed now to shine the more brilliantly from the pinnacle of glory which he had attained. If he practised every artifice to acquire or retain the affections of all classes, it was to ensure an abundant return of gratitude, and acquiescence in the demands he meditated. While he dazzled them with the lustre of his splendid achievements, and tempered with kindness and affability the haughtiness of military command, he secured an indemnity for the boldness with which he had multiplied his legions beyond the limits fixed by the government, and fortified his position against the malevolence of a future consul. In lavishing upon his flatterers the spoils of his successful wars¹, he was preparing to thrust his hands into the public treasury, for the payment of the armies² he had led to victory. These manœuvres were crowned with a large measure of success. Senators and knights returned to Rome, their ears tingling with his compliments, their hands overflowing with his benefactions. The spendthrift extolled his generosity; the prudent admired his dexterity; even of the best and gravest many bowed beneath the ascendancy of his character, in which they beheld the last pledge of public order, energy, and security.

¹ Lucca, according to the ancient orthography, Luca, was on the frontier of Liguria, which was comprehended in the province of Gallia Cisalpina. It was first included in Etruria by Augustus. Mannert, G. der G. und R. ix. i. 391.; Suet. Jul. 24.: "In urbem provinciae sue Lucam."

² Plut. Cæs. 21.; App. B.C. ii. 17. At Lucca Cæsar passed the winter of 697--698.

The enmity between Pompeius and Crassus was felt by Cæsar, who had so much use to make of both, to be highly disadvantageous to his interests. He was anxious to effect a reconciliation between them before he left Italy to resume the command of his armies. He obtained interviews with them separately, with Crassus at Ravenna, afterwards with Pompeius at Lucca, where he eventually succeeded in bringing them together.³ The winter had passed, and he had not yet torn himself from the scene of his intrigues, when at the commencement of the month of April he was assailed by a direct attack on the part of the oligarchs. The onset was led by Cicero himself. The orator, after the first outburst of vanity and exultation, had learned to take a juster view of his own position. The glory which surrounds him in the

The triumvirs
met at Lucca and arranged their policy in conceit.

¹ See the instance of C. Rabirius Postumus, whose necessities Cæsar relieved, in the speech of Cicero, pro Rab. Post. 15, 16. Comp. Sallust, B. Catil. 54. Cæsar . . . negotiis amicorum intentus sua negligere; nihil denegare quod dono dignum esset, &c. The effects of Gallic gold became more evident at a later period.

² Dion, xxxix. 25.

³ Suet. Jul. 24.

eyes of posterity, for the splendour of his genius and the dignity of his character, has blinded too many historians to the moderate estimation in which he was held by his own contemporaries. Among the statesmen of his party Cicero occupied only a secondary place. The brand of ignoble birth was upon him; his ascent to power was obstructed, his retention of it thwarted by his own allies; it was only when his services were essential that they consented to place him at their head. Cicero, for his part, had discovered that a man who could be so easily overthrown ought not to aspire to command. The nobles had blandly waived his invitation to take them under his wing. The sneering tone in which he continues to speak of them may lead us to infer that he keenly felt the disparagement they cast upon him. But he bowed to circumstances. Through the first three months of the year he displayed himself very little on the stage of public affairs.¹ But suddenly, in the beginning of April, he startled the city by stepping prominently forward, and attacking Cæsar's law for the division of lands in Campania.² The government had recently been obliged to place a large sum, forty millions of sesterces, at the disposal of its high commissioner for the supply of the city. The treasury was drained, and it was easy to assert that there were no means forthcoming for the purchase of lands, according to the tenor of the late agrarian enactment. Now the nobles had need of boldness and eloquence. At their instigation Cicero proposed that the law should be altogether repealed; and the senate, full, he assures us, of admiration at his manœuvre, which it pretended to ascribe to himself alone, received the motion with acclamations, such as were oftener heard in a popular assembly than in the deliberations of so august a council.¹ The matter, it was resolved, should stand over for solemn discussion on an appointed day in the following month.² The interview of the triumvirs was devoted to tracing the line of their policy with reference to this hostile demonstration. In the first place, it was determined that all jealousies between the associates must give way to the defence of their common interests. The election of Domitius must be defeated, and Cæsar urged his colleagues to present themselves as candidates in opposition to him.³ If successful, he depended on the covenants between them to secure him in his military command, and to enlarge his powers to any extent he might choose to demand. Should the senate persist in preventing the people from assembling, he was confident that it must ultimately be tired out, or frightened from its course by the fear of a dictatorship. Meanwhile Pompeius should use every endeavour to detach Cicero from the enemy, and assist in procuring the prolongation of Cæsar's command, together with the other indulgences which he required.

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 6.: "Quo me libentius a curia et ab omni parte rei publicæ subtraho."

² The question of a repeal had already been mooted by the tribune Lopus in the December preceding, but Marcellinus had thought it prudent not to discuss it during a temporary absence of Pompeius. Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 1.

The proconsul now once more crossed the Alps. Pompeius passed over to Sardinia, where he met his legate Q. Cicero, whom he chose to consider, upon his acceptance of a post under him, as a pledge for his brother's

Cicero's equivocal conduct in abandoning the nobles,
and attaching himself to the triumvirs.

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 5.: "Clamore prope concionali."

² Cic. ad Div. i. 9.: "Non. April. mihi est Senatus assensus ut de agro Campano frequenti Senatu id. Mai. referretur."

³ Suet. Jul. 24.: "Sed cum L. Domitius consulatus candidatus palam minaretur, consulem se effecturum quod prætor nequisset, adempturumque ei exercitus, Crassum Pompeiumque in urbem provincie suæ Lucam extractos compulit, ut detrudendi Domitii causa alterum consulatum peterent."

allegiance.¹ No sooner had the orator delivered his speech against Cæsar's agrarian law than he had hastened to pay a visit to Pompeius, who was on the point of leaving Rome for Sardinia, with the hope of eliciting from him some tokens of approbation. But the crafty dissembler was impenetrably reserved²; he did not even mention that he expected to meet Cæsar at Lucca on his way. Cicero probably augured no good from this taciturnity. He had already revolved in his mind the rashness of the move he had made; he had balanced the disastrous consequences of a breach with the triumvirs against the slender support he could expect from the weak and wavering faction to which he had renewed his devotion. He was relieved perhaps from a weight of anxiety when he received letters from his brother expostulating with him on his hostility to Cæsar, urging the policy of concession, and still assuring him that the triumvirs, though offended, were not implacable. We discover immediately an entire change in the tone of the orator's correspondence.³ He abandons resentfully the cause of the oligarchs, against whose faithlessness and frivolity he lashes himself into indignation. They no longer love him, he says, and he must now transfer his regard to others who do so. He paints to himself in glowing colours the merits of the great chiefs of the republic, and argues from the maxims of wise men of old that the simple citizen should conform his views to those of the best and noblest. He deprecates the charge of inconstancy in tones which seem to admit its justice, and finally resigns himself in despair to the irresistible current of circumstances.

¹ Cic. ad Div. i. 9.

² Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 6.

³ Compare Cicero's letters, ad Att. iv. 5., ad Div. i. 7., and more particularly that to Lentulus ad Div. i. 9., in which he reviews his political course at this period.

Cicero indeed was spared the disgrace of refuting in May the arguments which he had alleged against Cæsar's law in the month preceding. The senate, abandoned by its spokesman, allowed the matter to drop. But when he next appeared in the arena of public discussion, it was to pronounce a laboured panegyric upon the very man against whom he had so lately led the ranks of opposition. Before proceeding to the election of consuls, the nobles bethought them of the Sempronian law, according to which the consular provinces were to be assigned prospectively before the day of election. Little regard, as we have seen, had been paid to an enactment so adverse to the rapid and fluctuating combinations of the day; nevertheless it might be made an instrument for assailing an enemy, and it was not forgotten that Cæsar had received his three provinces in utter defiance of it. It was now proposed, not only to enforce it, but even to give it a retrospective effect.¹ All the speakers, except Servilius, had declared themselves in favour of depriving the Gallic proconsul of one or more of the governments he held in conjunction, when Cicero stepped forward in his defence, with a speech of peculiar dignity and spirit. He pointed with just enthusiasm to the extent and rapidity of Cæsar's conquests; he had broken the Helvetians, he had repulsed the Germans, he had received submission and hostages from every state of Gaul. Cicero urged the expediency of allowing him to complete and consolidate the work he had thus successfully begun;

Cicero's speech de Provinciis Consularibus - he defends Cæsar and Pompeius, and revenges himself upon Piso and Gabinius.

¹ Cic. Orat de Provinciis Consularibus; ad Div. i. 9. This speech was probably delivered in May (comp. ad Div. i. 7.), when Cicero alludes to the discussion in a letter to Lentulus, though he seems to be withheld by shame from mentioning the part he took in it himself: "Quod eo ad te brevius scribo, quia me status hic reipublicæ non delectat." Abeken, p. 153.

a work which should relieve Rome thenceforward from any dread of foreign invasion. By an artful panegyric on Pompeius, the victor of the east, the orator insinuated the importance of fostering the genius of an ambitious rival. He claimed it as a merit that he had prevailed on the senate to increase the number of Cæsar's lieutenants, and to grant him the pecuniary supplies which the war demanded¹; finally, he contended that such indulgences must, in consistency, be crowned by repelling with indignation the blow now aimed against him. These arguments and instances, backed by the influence of the triumvirs, averted the impending decree. But Cicero had not missed the opportunity of avenging himself on the consuls who had consented to his banishment. He showed with his usual felicity how strongly the Sempronian law condemned the appointment of Piso and Gabinius to Macedonia and Syria, and he even succeeded in effecting their recal.²

The consuls resist the election of their successors till the expiration of their offices. But with whatever gravity and decorum the senate might continue its discussions, in anticipation of the due election of magistrates, there were forces out of doors beyond its control, which had arrayed themselves in so hostile an attitude, that it could not venture to invoke the decision of the comitia. Pompeius and Crassus were canvassing the tribes; the demagogues of the forum, again in secret league with them³, were stirring up the passions of the populace, and urging them to reject the nominee of the oligarchy. When it became manifest that

¹ Dion, xxxix. 25.

² Ascon. in Pison. arg. p. 2.: "Revocati . . . ex provinciis Piso et Gabinius." The latter, however, did not relinquish his government till M. Crassus came to supersede him, A.U. 700. Piso was summoned home without delay, and his province handed over to the prætor Q. Ancharius. Cic. in Pis. 36.

³ Dion, xxxix. 29.: Κλάδιος δὲ ἐν τούτῳ μεταπηδήσας αὖθις πρὸς τὸν Πομπήιον. κ. τ. λ.

Domitius could not succeed, the senate, under the daring guidance of Marcellinus, determined at least to prevent the election of any other candidate. Day after day the consuls interposed with adverse auspices, and forbade the tribes to assemble. There still existed sufficient reverence for the forms of the constitution to ensure respect even to this stretch of prerogative. The election of magistrates was so closely bound up with the observances of the state religion, that no appointment could command the regard even of its own authors which was not sanctioned by the ordinary modes of procedure. Indeed, the obstinacy with which Marcellinus maintained a struggle which could only increase the confusion of affairs, earned him the acclamations even of the fickle populace. He replied to their insensate shouts by solemnly warning them that a time was coming when even their voices should be no longer free.¹ He wished, perhaps, to prepare their minds for that final appeal to arms which the nobles had been long revolving in their wild and fluctuating counsels. But the consuls knew that their power was on the point of expiring with the close of the current year, and that it would be impossible ultimately to resist the usurpation with which the commonwealth was threatened. They abstained during the remainder of their term from all the duties <sup>A.U.699.
B.C.55.</sup> of their office. They neither relinquished the mourning in which they had clad themselves, nor attended the popular spectacles, nor feasted in the Capitol on Jove's solemn day, nor celebrated the great Latin festival on the Alban mount, but continued to conduct themselves in every thing as men under constraint, and magistrates deprived of their legitimate power.²

¹ Val. Max. vi. 2. 6.

² Dion, xxxix. 30.

As soon as the curule chairs had become vacant, Pompeius and Crassus obtain their elections to the consulship by violence, at the commencement of the year 699. the triumvirs reappeared on the stage. With the assistance of C. Cato and the other tribunes devoted to them, they convened the people, and enacted a shadow of the forms of election. They resorted to violence and bribery with equal recklessness; but it was not till young Crassus arrived from Gaul with a detachment of Cæsar's veterans, to control the elections, that the nobles finally gave way. Domitius himself had doggedly interposed as a candidate, and only retired from the contest when his attendant had been slain at his side.¹ The new consuls, Pompeius and Crassus, having obtained their own appointment by violating every principle of justice and law, proceeded to employ similar means to secure the other magistracies for creatures on whom they could rely.² M. Cato, who was a candidate for the prætorship, was mortified by a contemptuous rejection which the character of Vatinius, the rival to whom the all-powerful consuls postponed him, rendered the more insulting.³ Nor indeed did the sworn defenders of the public tranquillity carry their point in all cases without bloodshed. But quiet was eventually restored; they were feared for their vigour, if not respected, and Rome settled down for a time in exhaustion and disgust under the tyranny of her new rulers.

When Pompeius looked back upon his own career, Pompeius compares his position with that of Cæsar, and meditates a change of policy. from the time of his return from Asia, in the enjoyment of unexampled glory, and with the prospect of exerting almost boundless influence, he could not fail to

¹ Dion, xxxix. 31.; App. B.C. ii. 17.

² Two only of the new tribunes, C. Ateius Capito and P. Aquilius Gallus, were hostile to them. Dion, xxxix. 32.

³ Liv. Epit. cv.; Val. Max. vii. 5.: "Comitiorum maximum crimen . . . proxima dementiæ suffragia . . . quem honorem Catoni observe that he had fallen from the summit of dignity which he then occupied, and that Cæsar, a younger aspirant, was threatening to outclimb him at no distant day. He might remark how different had been the course they had respectively pursued. The one had awaited in proud inaction the offer of fresh honours and powers; the other had seized and secured them with his own hands. The one had studied to increase the confusion of public affairs, by balancing faction against faction; the other had attached himself, without wavering, to the party with which he was hereditarily connected. The one had hoped that the necessities of the state would at last combine all men in the common policy of elevating him to the dictatorship; the other had applied himself steadily to the task of reducing his opponents to insignificance, and throwing the creation of a supreme ruler into the hands of his own devoted adherents. Pompeius seems to have now determined to alter his previous course, and imitate that of his more audacious competitor, by bolder and more hazardous steps, such as he had not shrunk from himself in earlier times, when his position was still to be won. With this view he had grasped at the consulship, and obtained it by means which the nobles could never forgive. He wanted, as we have seen, to secure the reversion of a province, and to place himself again at the head of an army. A short experience of civil affairs had sufficed to teach him that the profession of his early choice, in which he had been invincible, was the most natural to him, as well as the most available for his purposes. As a military chieftain, he might enact again the crowning triumphs of his master Sulla, whom he had imitated denegaverant Vatinio dare coacti sunt." This striking perversion of justice was remembered four centuries later: comp. Mamert. Grat. Act. ad Julian. c. 19.: "Unde factum est ut maiores nostri viderent Vatinios designatos et repulso Catones."

in the outset of his career with such fidelity and success. But the toils in which Cæsar had entangled him, by the connexion he had so dexterously formed between them, confined his movements on every side, and disabled him from the free use of the victory he had gained.

Law of Trebonius for conferring provinces on Pompeius and Crassus Jealousy of Cæsar's adherents.

The consuls began their career with an outward show of moderation, affecting to be content with their brilliant position, and to look for no ulterior advantages. But C. Trebonius, one of their tribunitian allies, came forward in their service, and, no doubt, at their own suggestion, with a proposal that the governments of Spain and Syria should be conferred upon them respectively, at the expiration of their year of office, for a term of five years, together with extensive powers for making war and levying armies.¹ The friends of Cæsar were immediately roused. A renewal of the lease of his own proconsulate was the object at which Cæsar was aiming. His original term was now only in the course of its fourth year, but his plans required several more for their full development. There must be fresh campaigns to complete the training of his soldiers; new resources must be discovered to gorge the cupidity of his officers. Gaul, he might urge, once conquered, had risen again in arms; Germany and Britain loomed obscurely in the distance; the mere proximity of freedom furnished a dangerous example to unsettled and discontented subjects. The excuse was plausible; but it was only a pretence; the real objects of the proconsul were not such as could be revealed in the Roman forum. Accordingly, the partisans of Cæsar, zealous for their patron's advancement, and not less so for their own private interests, declared that they would suffer no such augmentation of the dignity of Pompeius and Crassus, without securing an equivalent for their absent associate. The consuls were compelled reluctantly to recede from their own exclusive pretensions, and it was signified to Trebonius, as their wish, that he should propose another law for the prolongation of Cæsar's command also.¹

¹ Liv. Epit. cv.; Dion, xxxix. 33.: Στρατιώταις τὲ ὅσοις ἀν ἔθελήσωσι καὶ τῶν πολιτῶν καὶ τῶν συμμάχων χρωμένοις, καὶ πόλεμον καὶ εἰρήνην πρὸς οὓς ἀν βουληθῶσι ποιουμένοις.

If the statesmen of Rome were mortified by the arrogance of consuls who had thrust themselves unbidden into the seats they occupied, they were still more alarmed at the demands unfolded from the rival quarter. They could not fail to foresee that, in making such large concessions, they would build up from its foundations a power such as had never before overshadowed the commonwealth; for it was manifest that these latter years of Cæsar's government would consolidate his influence over his soldiers, by weaning them from the habits and prejudices of citizens, and teaching them to centre all their feelings of duty and obedience in their leader alone. No sooner, therefore, were these motions made, than the nobles arrayed themselves for another struggle. It was not, however, Lucullus, and Servilius, and Cicero that now appeared, as formerly, in the van. M. Cato, the influence of whose grave consistency had been almost obliterated by daily collision with violence and vulgarity, and Favonius, a party brawler, rather than a political champion, were the most active leaders of the oligarchy. Ateius and Aquilius, in their capacity of tribunes, were willing to throw over them the bruised and battered shield of their official dignity. But under the guidance of such men as

Law for the prolongation
of Cæsar's command for five years opposed by the senatorial
party.

¹ App. B. C. ii. 18.; Vell. ii. 46.: "Cæsari legc, quam Pompeius ad populum tulit, prorogatæ in idem spatium temporis provinciæ."

these, the cause was in danger of being rendered ridiculous. Favonius, being limited to an harangue of a single hour, consumed the whole of it in remonstrating against the shortness of the time allotted him. Cato, to whom a double space was conceded, launched forth into a general invective against the conduct of his opponents, tracking their violence and treachery through the whole sequence of political events, so that his time also was exhausted before he had arrived at the real point of discussion.¹ Such were the infirmities of the men to whose discretion the indolence or despair of the nobles had now consigned their cause.

Thus was the whole day consumed before Trebonius and his allies on the tribunitian bench found an opportunity of delivering their sentiments; for it was the custom, derived from simpler times, to allow private persons to take the precedence in discussion, that they might not be unduly biassed by the superior authority of those who spoke from official seats. Cato had gained his point so far as to retard the discussion by twenty-four hours. But it was about to be renewed on the morrow. Aquilius, fearing now that his opponents' exasperation might induce them to use violence to prevent his appearance in the forum in the morning passed the night in one of the curias on the spot. His ingenuity, however, was of little avail. Trebonius caused the doors of the building to be blocked up, and kept his colleague in durance through the greater part of the ensuing day. At the same time he obstructed the passages which led to the forum, and excluded with a high hand Ateius, Cato, Favonius, and all the most notable men of their party. Some of them, indeed, contrived to slip unobserved into the assembly, while others forced their way into

The law is carried by popular
violence.

¹ Plut. Cat. Min. 43.; Dion, xxxix. 34.

the inclosure over the heads of the crowd. Cato and Ateius were lifted upon men's shoulders, and from that unsteady elevation the voice of the tribune was heard above the din, proclaiming that the auspices were adverse, the proceedings illegal, and the assembly formally dissolved. He was answered by the brandishing of clubs, and by showers of stones; swords and daggers were drawn in the affray, and the friends of the senatorial party were driven from the arena, not without bloodshed.¹ Such were the tumultuary proceedings by which the triumvirs secured a pretended ratification of their schemes.

In such scenes as these, the consuls themselves did not scruple to take part openly. Not long before, at the election of ædiles, the robe of Pompeius had been sprinkled with the blood of a victim of popular ferocity. This accident was eventually attended by the most fatal consequences.² On his return home, thus disfigured, he was met at his door by his wife Julia, suddenly informed of the fray, and hastening to welcome her husband on his safe arrival. The youthful matron, devotedly attached to her spouse, and far advanced in pregnancy, was so much alarmed at the sight, that she was seized with premature labour. The event gave a shock to her constitution, from which, as will appear, she never wholly recovered.

The populace, who delighted in thwarting the senate and mobbing its champions, had nevertheless no sympathy for the chieftains who had now condescended to become their leaders. In vain did Pompeius study to ingratiate himself with them, as Cæsar had done before him, by the magnificence of his public exhibitions. The splendour, indeed, even of Cæsar's

Disastrous consequences of this affray to Pompeius.

Pompeius
seeks to ingratiate himself
with the populace. His magnificent theatre.

¹ Plat. l. c. Pomp. 52., Crass. 15.; Dion, xxxix. 35, 36.

² Plat. Pomp. 53.

ædileship was eclipsed by the opening of his rival's gorgeous theatre, the first edifice of the kind at Rome constructed of stone, and designed for permanence.¹ Within the circuit of its walls it could accommodate forty thousand spectators, no small portion of the resident population of the city; and it was adorned with a profusion of gold, marble and precious stones, such as the western world had never before witnessed. That such profuse magnificence might not seem to be lavished upon a work of mere luxury, a temple was attached to it dedicated to Venus the Conqueror, so placed that the seats of the theatre might serve as a flight of stairs to the sacred edifice. The ceremony of consecration was attended with a display of music, with chariot races, and all the games of the palæstra.² In the course of five successive days, five hundred lions were sent forth to be hunted and slaughtered in the arena. Eighteen elephants were made to fight with trained bands of gladiators; but the populace was seized with a fit of unusual sensibility, and the cries and agonies of these half-reasoning animals damped even the excitement of such a spectacle with pity and disgust.³ Some even professed to interpret

¹ Dion, xxxix. 38.: φ καὶ νῦν λαμπρυνόμεθα. Tac. Ann. xiv. 20.: “Quippe erant qui Cn. Pompeium incusatum a senioribus ferrent, quod mansuram theatri sedem posuisset: nam antea subitariis gradibus et scena in tempus structa ludos edi solitos, vel, si vetustiora repetas, stantem populum spectavisse.” The founder was supposed to regard none of his exploits with more complacency than the erection of this magnificent edifice. Compare Lucan, i. 133.: “Plausuque sni gaudere theatri.” vii. 10.:

“ Nam Pompeiani visus sibi sede theatri
Innumeram effigiem Romanæ cernere plebis;
Attolique snum lætis ad sidera nomen
Vocibus, et plausu cuncos certare sonantes.”

The sentiments of the ancients on this building are collected, and its later history related by Drumann, iv. 521.

² Dion, l. c.; Plut. Pomp. 52.; Cic. de Off. ii. 16.; Plin. H. N. xxxvi. 24.

³ Cic. ad Div. vii. 1.; Plin. H. N. viii. 7.: “Tanto dolore, ut populus fiens universus consurgeret, dirasque Pompeio quas ille mox luit imprecaretur.”

the miserable wailings of the victims, and affirmed that they appealed to the generosity and justice of the Roman people, having only been induced to leave their native shores on assurances of safety, which their captors had confirmed to them by oath.¹ After all, the liberality, as averred by the great man's detractors, was not Pompeius's own.² The building had been raised by the taste and munificence of Demetrius, one of his freedmen, who had thus devoted to the entertainment of the public the treasures he had accumulated in following his patron's fortunes. He had considerably bestowed upon it the name of Pompeius, to screen from the invidious gaze of the citizens the enormous amount of his own private gains.

Whatever remnant of gratitude, however, the Romans might feel towards their consul, after the efforts he had made to amuse them, they were dissatisfied both with him and with themselves, when they beheld the legions which he and his colleague had hastened to levy in pursuance of their late decree. The tribunes even attempted to revoke the sanction under which they had been raised, but the speedy preparations of Crassus for possessing himself of his eastern government, and the apparent moderation of Pompeius, who despatched his troops to Spain, that their presence in the neighbourhood of the city might afford no cause for jealousy, soon engaged them to relax from their hostility. Pompeius himself determined not to quit the centre of affairs; the functions with which he had been invested as comptroller of supplies gave him a ready excuse³; and he proposed,

He remains in Italy, and governs his province by his legates.

¹ The credit of this statement must be appropriated to Dion exclusively.

² Dion, l. c.

³ Dion, xxxix. 39.; Plut. Pomp. 53. The good-natured philosopher attributes Pompeius's stay at Rome solely to his affection for his wife.

for the first time since the establishment of the republic, to govern his province through his lieutenants alone.

During their consulship Pompeius and Crassus had turned some portion of their attention, though with little energy or decision, to the enactment of sumptuary laws; a course which always flatters the envious feelings of the middle classes, and which met at Rome with the cold approbation of discreet and experienced men even among the highest. But in this policy they were speedily defeated by the selfishness of the nobles, particularly of Hortensius¹, and they were easily induced to desist from a project, undertaken probably more for the sake of appearances than from any real devotion to antique simplicity. They succeeded, however, in establishing a pecuniary qualification for the office of *judex*², instead of the merely arbitrary selection from the privileged orders, the senators, knights and ærarian tribunes, which had prevailed since the enactment of the Aurelian law.³ This reform, also, had a specious appearance, inasmuch as it tended to confine a post of much responsibility and temptation to the classes which, from their affluent or easy circumstances, might be deemed sufficiently free from the ordinary incitements to cupidity. Nevertheless, in the frightful state of the reigning immorality, it had probably no other effect but to enhance the price of judicial venality. But Crassus was eminently studious of outward decorum, and such, no doubt, was the character which the measure seemed at first sight to Enactment of sumptuary laws, and a pecuniary qualification for the office of judex.

¹ Dion, xxxix. 37.

² Cic. Philipp. i. 8.; Ascon. in Cic. Pison. 94.: "Pompeius in consulatu secundo . . . promulgavit ut amplissimo ex censu, ex centuriis aliter quam antea lecti judices, aque tamen ex illis tribus ordinibus res judicarent." Comp. Fischer, Röm. Zeittafeln, p. 247.

³ A.U. 684, B.C. 70.

bear. On the other hand, it was a direct boon to the moneyed interest; it raised wealth above birth, virtue and education; it tended to hasten the consummation of social corruption, when poverty is branded as a crime, and riches become the sole object of popular adoration.

The overwhelming preponderance of the triumvirs in the scales of power reduced Cicero to a state of political inactivity. He studied to secure the friendship, or, in other words, the protection both of Cæsar and Pompeius, while at the same time he shrank from joining systematically in the defence of their policy, the only condition on which they would freely impart it. On the one hand, he writes with great satisfaction of the visit with which Pompeius had honoured his retirement, not unmixed, however, with serious misgivings as to the sincerity of his friendly expressions¹; on the other, he pays his court assiduously to the proconsul in Gaul, through his brother Quintus, who had accepted the post of legatus there, and other officers in the army. He submits his poetical compositions to the judgment of the accomplished captain, and is highly delighted with the flattery he receives in return.² He hints that he is engaged on a poem in celebration of Cæsar's invasion of Britain, which now occupied public attention; he appeals to his brother for the facts; the form, he says, shall be supplied by his own genius.³ Towards Crassus, however, whose person and character he always regarded with aversion, Cicero made no advances; he could not put on the guise of affection where his feelings were of a nature directly opposite. Pompeius and Cæsar, indeed, on their part constantly strove to effect a better under-

Political position of Cicero: his connexion with the triumvirs, and hollow reconciliation with Crassus.

¹ Cic. ad Att. iv. 9.

² Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 15.

² Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 16.

standing between him and their colleague, and their efforts were strongly seconded by the mutual regard of the orator and the younger Crassus. But the enmity of many years, as Cicero himself confesses, burst forth in a violent altercation between himself and Crassus in the senate, just before the departure of the Syrian proconsul for his province, and this open rupture was with difficulty skinned over at the last moment to meet the public eye.¹ The stress which the triumvirs laid upon the mere appearance of a reconciliation may have flattered Cicero's self-importance; but the advice of his friend Atticus was probably the wisest that could be offered, in urging him, at this crisis, to abandon political life. From the termination of the affair of Catilina, his part was, in fact, concluded. His triumphant return from banishment formed an appropriate drop-scene to the ^{His mental} noble interlude of which he had been the resources. hero. But in the midst of all his cares, the disappointment of his ambition, the ingratitude of one set of friends and the insincerity of another, embittered as they were by his constant apprehensions for the welfare of his country, he still filled every vacant moment with the recreations of literature and philosophy.² His doors stood always open to any friend who would contribute a speculation or a criticism to his overflowing stores of thought. His mind, irritable, perplexed and desponding in public matters, recovered, in these healthier engagements, its calmness, its dignity and its strength. In philosophy he kept his aim before him with a steadiness which it had been well for his fame if he could have imparted to his political career; or rather, the same disposition to balance and temporize, which wrecked his fortunes as a statesman, fitted him to hear all parties and weigh all theoretical opinions, and, if not to discover speculative truth, at least to limit on all sides the encroachments of error.¹

¹ Cic. ad Div. i. 9.: "Crassus, ut quasi testata populo Rom. esset nostra gratia, poene a meis laribus est in provinciam profectus." The reconciliation was attested by a supper, at which the parties met in the gardens of Crassipes, who had lately married the orator's daughter Tullia: "Quum mihi condixisset, cœnavit apud me in mei generi Crassipedis hortis."

² It was in the course of this year that Cicero wrote, or at least completed his dialogue de Oratore, the most elaborate and interesting perhaps of his works. Cic. ad Att. iv. 13. 16., ad Div. i. 9.

Unable to adjust their rival pretensions to restore the king of Egypt to his throne, the statesmen of Rome had allowed the affair to fall into abeyance. We have seen that Lentulus Spinther had gone to his province of Cilicia, in the expectation of receiving full powers from the government to carry that measure into execution, according to the tenor of the bill which he had himself proposed. When the complete ratification of his commission was withheld, and the subject reopened for competition and intrigue, Cicero undertook to watch over the interests of his friend the late consul, and continued to amuse him with hopes of eventually bringing the matter to a favourable issue. But meanwhile the affair, which had lingered so long at Rome, and had become at last forgotten in the hurry of more momentous agitations, was settled at once by a daring and unscrupulous hand. Gabinius, on the expiration of his consulship at the end of the year 696, had succeeded to the government of Syria. We meet with no trace of any special enactment by which that office was assured to him for any longer period than the ordinary term of twelve

Transactions
of Gabinius in his government of Syria.
A. U. 697, 698.

He resolves to restore Ptolemaeus Auletes to the throne of Egypt.

¹ A story was told of Cicero (Plut. Cic. 5.), that in his youth he consulted the oracle at Delphi how he might acquire fame, and that he received in answer the prudent advice, to make the bent of his own genius, and not the estimation of the world, the guide of his life. This pleasing fiction expresses the judgment of posterity upon his character.

months; nevertheless, he occupied it through the space of two years complete, and did not quit it, even after his formal recal upon Cicero's motion, till towards the end of 699, when Crassus was preparing to supersede him.¹ The aggressive and tyrannical character which distinguished the conduct of the Roman proconsuls, both towards their own subjects and foreigners, was maintained by Gabinius with systematic vigour. With regard to Judea he adopted the policy which Pompeius had bequeathed to his successors in Syria, and supported Hyrcanus by a military force against the family of his brother Aristobulus. The restlessness of the Arabs on the frontier might demand his vigilance and activity, and excuse the attacks which he made upon the neighbouring tribes. Some trifling successes obtained in these enterprises acquired for him from his soldiers the title of Imperator.² But when he applied to the senate for a supplication, in honour apparently of his vaunted exploits in one of these expeditions, the nobles evinced their dislike to him, and their stifled resentment towards his patron Pompeius, by a contemptuous refusal.³ Such an affront, it was said, had never before been cast upon a proconsul, and it served rather to excite than to check his ambition and audacity. Gabinius next proposed to restore to the throne of Parthia a claimant named Mithridates, who had been ejected from it by his brother Orodes.

¹ The laws of Sulla, always adapted to enhance the influence of the senate, permitted the proconsul to remain in his province, after the expiration of the year, until he was superseded by a successor (Drumann, ii. 190.). Cicero, in a letter to Lentulus (ad Div. i. 9.), suggests to him that he is not authorized to leave Cilicia before the arrival of a new proconsul with full powers.

² It seems that Gabinius suffered some ignominious losses in these campaigns. Cic. pro Sest. 33.: "Neque equitatum in Syria et cohortes optimas perdidissemus."

³ Cic. Philipp. xiv. 9., ad Qu. Fr. ii. 8.: "Id. Malis senatus frequens divinus fuit in supplicatione Gabinio deneganda."

But he was besieged at the same time by the importunities of Auletes, who had retired disappointed from the doors of his patrons in Rome, and the offer of a direct bribe induced him to adopt in preference the cause of the Egyptian.¹

The population of Alexandria, which gave law to Egypt, was headstrong and rebellious, and always required to be amused into obedience to its sovereigns. It had expelled Auletes from his throne, and bestowed the vacant seat upon his daughter Berenice. When the exiled monarch repaired to Rome, and prayed the senate to restore him to the dignity which the declaration of friendship and alliance on the part of the republic had solemnly assured him, the Alexandrians sought to strengthen themselves against the impending danger.² They invited Seleucus, a scion of the dynasty which had lately reigned in Syria, to partake the throne and bed of their young queen. But both the people and the sovereign seem to have been soon dissatisfied with this alliance, and the unfortunate prince was strangled by the orders of his consort. Another competitor for the precarious distinction was found however in the person of Archelaus, the son, we are assured, of one of the generals of Mithridates, but who pretended to be the offspring of the great king himself, and aspired to wield the influence of that formidable name. Gabinius, it seems, had

Berenice, daughter of Ptolemaeus,
reigns in Alexandria.

¹ His cause was recommended to Gabinius by letters from Pompeius himself. Dion, xxxix. 56.

² Cæsar had asserted that the kingdom of Egypt had been bequeathed to the Roman people by Alexander I. (see above, p. 99.). That sovereign had left one daughter, Berenice, and two illegitimate sons, afterwards kings of Egypt and Cyprus. The daughter died, and Auletes, the elder of the brothers, experienced great difficulty in establishing his claim to the succession. The jealousy of the senate saved him from the aggression meditated by Cæsar, and he spent 6000 talents in winning over the nobles whom he principally feared. Suet. Jul. 54.; Dion, xxx. 12.; Plut. Cæs. 48.

captured this man at an earlier period, and had purposely allowed him to escape¹, in order to embroil the Egyptian court still more with the government of Rome, and give a colour to the violence he meditated in direct opposition to the decree of the senate.

Upon the arrival of the proconsul with his legions, bringing Ptolemæus in his train, the Egyptians did not hesitate to rise in arms for the defence of their sovereign and their own freedom of choice. But resistance was fruitless. The Alexandrian populace, however violent and reckless of their lives in tumults and seditions, were not fit subjects for military discipline, and formed a contemptible soldiery.² Gabinius entered the city after one or two skirmishes, and effected the revolution to which he had pledged himself. Ptolemæus reascended his throne, and his first act was to put his daughter to death, to gratify his vengeance or ensure his safety, and the next to massacre the noblest and richest of her adherents, in order to amass the enormous sum which he had promised as the price of his restoration.³

A small portion only of this Egyptian gold found its way into the private coffers of Gabinius; the greater part he was compelled to expend in buying impunity for his violation of the law. He dared not even send an account

Superstitious
alarms of the Roman populace.

¹ Dion (xxxix. 57.) mentions the fact of this connivance.

² Comp. Dion's remarks on the character of the Alexandrians (xxxix. 58.), and Ammian. Marcell. xxii. 11.: "In civitate quæ suopte motu et ubi causæ non suppetunt, seditionibus crebris agitatur et turbulentis, ut oraculorum quoque loquitur fides;" where Valesius adduces other passages from the ecclesiastical historians. Compare also Vopiscus in Saturn. 7.; Dion Chrys. Orat. xxxii.

³ This sum is stated at ten thousand talents, above two millions of our money. In such a matter we may readily suspect exaggeration. The celebrated wealth of Crassus, at the highest computation (Plin. H.N. xxxiii. 47.), was not more than about eight thousand three hundred talents.

Gabinius restores Ptolemæus, who puts his daughter to death.
A.U. 699.
B.C.55.

of the transaction to his government, much less advance any claim to public honours. But the proconsul's share in the restoration of the fugitive monarch was too notorious to escape detection; nor was this the only part of his administration which demanded judicial inquiry. The Syrians complained of the consequences of his protracted absence from his province. They had been exposed to molestation from the brigands of the mountains and the desert; the publicani had been unable to collect the revenues; and the youthful Sisenna, the proconsul's son, whom he had left behind as his representative, had proved himself wholly unequal to the charge. There were not wanting personal enemies of Gabinius to excite against him the wrath and superstition of the Roman people. They wielded with fatal effect the terrors of the Sibylline oracle. To awaken the fears of the multitude was to sharpen their sense of his enormities.

As long as Pompeius and Crassus retained the consular office they threw the shield of their influence over the proconsul. The one was his political as he had formerly been his military leader, and could not now afford to dispense with his support; the other, it was said, was gained to his cause by a share in the spoils of his government.¹ Gabinius was allowed to remain unmolested in Syria; but the approach of Crassus, as his successor in the administration of that province, robbed him of this retreat, and constrained him to prepare for meeting his enemies in Rome. The intrigues of the triumvirs had prevented the election of new consuls till the close of the year. It was not till December that the perseverance of the nobles at last prevailed. The comitia were held, and now Domitius obtained the long-sought object of his ambition.¹ But the triumph of his friends was damped by the selection of Appius Claudius as his colleague, which threatened to counteract the schemes of aggression and revenge they secretly meditated. Appius was the brother of P. Clodius, the infamous tribune. He was closely connected with Pompeius by the marriage of his daughter with a son of the triumvir; and though he appears to have been on this account regarded with more consideration by Cicero, he was generally disliked and feared by the senatorial party. His career was distinguished even in that corrupt age by its unblushing venality. Though

Gabinus is succeeded in his province by Crassus.

¹ Dion, xxxix. 60.

^{He is threatened with impeachment.} professing to second the policy of Pompeius, he began his consulship by joining his colleague in threatening to impeach Gabinius²; not so much from a wish to rival his brother as a demagogue, as with the hope of extorting from the proconsul, by way of bribe, a portion of the treasures, the fame of which was already widely bruited.³ But Gabinius easily divined his views, and found the proper means of softening his hostility. Though ejected from the place of honour in Syria, he still

¹ L. Domitius Ahenobarbus and Appius Claudius Pulcher consuls, A.U. 700, B.C. 54.

² Such seems to be the meaning of the apparently corrupt passage. Dion, xxxix. 60.

³ Another instance of the cupidity of Appius appears in his proceedings respecting Antiochus, king of Commagene. This district, on the right bank of the Euphrates, formed a small dependent sovereignty. Antiochus, its ruler, had received from Cæsar, during his consulship, permission to wear the Roman toga, and was now petitioning the senate to confirm this honourable distinction, which had been disregarded, perhaps, by the neighbouring proconsuls, Lentulus or Gabinius. Appius had received presents to induce him to regard this suit with favour. Cicero attacked and ridiculed the pretensions of the kingling, apparently from mere levity, for it could not have been part of his deliberate policy to insult the obscurest of Cæsar's clients. Appius did every thing in his power to conciliate the orator, fearing that if the dependent kings should be deterred from suing to the Roman statesmen, it would dry up a most lucrative source of emolument. Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 12.

continued to linger in the province, whence he distributed bribes among his friends and enemies at Rome, and opposed the demand of a triumph to the charge of mal-administration suspended over him.¹ His conduct was first brought indirectly in question in February, when the citizens of Tyre complained before the senate of the ill treatment they had suffered from the publicani of his province. On this occasion Domitius eagerly displayed his illwill to the late proconsul, by administering a rebuke to the publicani for the honours they had paid him upon his surrender of office. But we may trace the effect of the Egyptian gold in the conduct of Appius, who now stretched his authority to prevent the assembling of the comitia, before which the tribunes had determined to bring forward a direct accusation.² The affair still lingered until the arrival of the culprit himself, which he had put off to the latest moment.

Notwithstanding the means with Gabinius had taken to gain to his interests the principal men of the city, the reception he encountered, upon his appearance in September before the walls, was so cold and disheartening that he did not venture to make a public entry. For it was not only the faction of the senate which had vowed his disgrace and ruin; the tide of popular feeling, worked upon through its superstitious terrors, had set decisively against him. Accordingly, he slunk within the gates privately and by night, and even then delayed for several days to render to the senate the official account of his administration. By the members of his order he was treated with haughtiness and harshness. Cicero attacked him with acrimony, and so provoked him, that he retorted by taunting his assailant with the disgrace of his exile. But matters had changed since Gabinius had left Rome. The senate, instead of cowering under the blows directed against its ancient champion, as in the triumphant days of the Clodian tribunate, rose to a man in his defence, and crowded around him, showering upon him expressions of applause and gratitude with all the enthusiasm of the period of his consulship. The influence of Pompeius, indeed, was interposed to screen Gabinius from its exasperation; but more than one accusation was impending over him, and L. Lentulus was first appointed to bring him to trial on the charge of majestas. The act of a military officer who made war without the express order of the government was defined as treason against the republic. In ordinary cases such an excess of zeal might meet with no severe condemnation; but the crime of Gabinius was of an aggravated character, for he had assailed Egypt in direct contravention of his orders. He defended himself on the plea, that, notwithstanding the decree of the senate to forbid the restoration of Ptolemæus, another resolution had obtained the suffrages of the tribes, by which it had been expressly enjoined.¹ Whether any hasty and irregular measures of Clodius had given a colour of legitimacy to this line of defence, or whether Gabinius relied upon a forgery, for the falsification of such a public instrument was neither impossible nor unexampled,² or whether, again, the plea rested merely upon an audacious fiction, the senate refused to admit it for a moment. But Cicero's opposition had already cooled down, the judges had been successfully tampered with, and, in spite of the hostility professed at least by both of the consuls, and the imprecations of the multitude, the criminal was acquitted upon the main charge, and the response of the Sybil was evasively interpreted to refer to circumstances altogether different. The acquiescence however of the people was not so easily secured, and the occurrence of a violent inundation of the Tiber¹ armed their superstition with new arguments against the victim who had not yet escaped them.

He returns to Rome, is impeached on a charge of majestas, but acquitted.

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 2.

² Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 13.

¹ Cic. pro Rabir. Post. 8.

² Cic. de Leg. iii. 20.; comp. Drumann, iii. 55. A flagrant instance of the kind is mentioned in Cic. ad Att. iv. 18.

A second charge was still pending against the proconsul for corruption and extortion,² but, triumphant upon the former issue, he was not much concerned about the other. He felt how well his gold had served him among the venal and corrupt, while, strange to say, the most high-minded of his enemies, Cicero, had been induced by Pompeius to undertake his defence. The triumvir himself, who had been absent from the neighbourhood of the city during the first trial, engaged to keep close at hand and redouble all his efforts to save him. But it was these very efforts, to all appearance, that lost him his cause. It was intolerable to hear Cicero maintain, at the beck of a veteran intriguer, the assertion of the Alexandrian witnesses, that Gabinius had received no bribe from the king of Egypt, when the fact was so notorious, that the same orator, in the very next cause that he pleads, admits it without hesitation.³ Indeed, there can be no doubt that Cicero's character suffered severely on this occasion in the estimation of his friends⁴: his own account of the affair gives no

Gabinius is accused of extortion in his government, defended by Cicero, but condemned and banished.

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 7.: "Cadit in absolutionem Gabinii." Dion, xxxix. 61.

² The corruption consisted in his accepting a sum of money from Ptolemaeus as the price of his restoration: besides this he was accused of having extorted four millions of sestertes from the provincials. Dion, xxxix. 55.

³ Cic. pro Rabir. Post. 12.

⁴ Dion, xxxix. 63.: ὅστε καὶ ἐκ τούτου τὸ τοῦ αὐτομόλου ἔγκλημα ἐπὶ πλεῖστον οἱ αὐξηθῆναι.

plausible excuse for this inconsistency. It was idle to boast of his placability, when he admits that the reconciliation was effected by the instances of the triumvir, whom it was evident he dared not disoblige.¹ His accepting from Pompeius a lieutenancy in Spain almost at the same moment² was both indecent and indiscreet. Nor were the judges better pleased, perhaps, at the officious interference of Cæsar, from whom Cicero produced a letter strongly urging the acquittal of the accused. To the surprise of both his friends and enemies, to the amazement probably of himself, the trial ended with the condemnation of Gabinius, and he was compelled to retire into banishment.³ His property was confiscated to the state, in liquidation of the fine which the judges proportioned to the amount of his acquisitions.⁴

Cicero's political allies felt themselves aggrieved by the open defection from their views which his defence of Gabinius manifested. It was evident, indeed, throughout the course of this year, that he had abandoned all hope of maintaining the ground they had assumed in opposition to the triumvirs, and that his aim, if not confined to the conservation of his own personal interests, was directed to the infusion of more patriotic sentiments into the breasts of those in whom all substantial power seemed now to be lodged. He had stood forward in the winter as the defender of Crassus, against an attempt on the part of the nobles to obtain his recal, almost before he had yet reached his province. Assuredly the senti-

¹ Cic. pro Rabir. Post. 12.: "Neque me vero paenitet, mortales inimicitias, sempiternas amicitias habere."

² This lieutenancy did not require his presence in the province, but provided him with an honourable retreat, together with the means of making a fortune, in case he should ever feel it expedient to leave Rome for a time. Cic. ad Div. vii. 5.

³ Dion, xxxix. 63.

⁴ Cic. pro Rabir. Post. 4.

Cicero attaches himself to the triumvirs, and affects great cordiality towards Crassus.

ments he expresses in a letter addressed to the pro-consul of Syria upon this occasion¹, if they were such as he publicly asserted at the time, were calculated to surprise and disgust those who had known the bitterness of the enmity recently subsisting between them. He declared that his own good-will towards the triumvir had been constant from the first; he was confident that this sympathy had been reciprocal; their mutual regard had been made the sport of false and pernicious associates. He repudiated the idea that his present defence of Crassus's character and conduct had been the effect of any new conviction; he had always watched his career with admiration, and studied to promote the closest intimacy between them. This was said, it must be remembered, in the face of their notorious jealousies and repeated quarrels. Cicero himself had been the first to insult Crassus, by giving all the glory of the destruction of Spartacus to his rival; he had deeply offended him by allowing suspicion to rest upon him with regard to his supposed participation in the councils of Catilina. On the other hand, the machinations of Clodius against the orator's dignity had been covertly encouraged by Crassus, no less than by the other triumvirs; and when we consider how little there was in the character of the sordid usurer to attract or dazzle the scholar and the sage, it is impossible to suppose that Cicero was as sincere in his forgiveness of Crassus, as in his reconciliation with Cæsar, or even with Pompeius.

But the orator continued to act systematically upon the policy he had laid down for himself in conciliating the triumvirs in succession. He made use of his brother Quintus, who, we have seen, was now serving as a lieutenant to Cæsar, and of his friend

Cicero defends Messius and Vatinus, the creatures of Cæsar and of Pompeius.

¹ Cic. ad Div. v. 8. (Febr. A.U. 700.)

Trebatius, who was occupied with civil employments in his suite, to ingratiate himself with the proconsul of Gaul.¹ He offered his services as a pleader to defend Messius, another of Cæsar's lieutenants, who left his general's camp at the summons of the senate to take his trial.² Vatinius also, an adherent both of Cæsar and Pompeius, who through their united influence had obtained the prætorship to the exclusion of M. Cato, and was now exerting all the influence of the tribunate in their behalf, found a defender in Cicero, when accused of bribery

His apology for his present line of conduct. by the senatorial party. The laboured apology for his own conduct in this particular instance, which the orator addresses to Lentulus in Cilicia, reveals his consciousness of the deep offence it had caused. Stung to the quick by the charges of desertion which his friends now cast upon him, Cicero at last turns indignantly upon them. Granted, he says, that Vatinius is the profligate and the traitor whom you describe; granted that I have myself assailed him publicly as such, though more for the sake of exalting the virtues of Cato than of denouncing the vices of his rival; yet it is not for you, chiefs of the senate, to taunt me with caressing a creature whom I despise, seeing what infamous wretches you have repeatedly recommended to my patronage, what encomiums you have heaped upon them, what falsehoods you have put in my mouth to grace my defence of them.³

The power of the nobles as a class is overawed by the enormous resources of individuals in the state. The authority of the nobles as a class had been completely undermined, not only by the attacks of Cæsar and the more covert machinations of Pompeius, but also by the silent change of circumstances, and the transfer of wealth and power into private hands. The violence which had been done to such a statesman as Catulus, and the disrespect with which Bibulus, Lentulus, and others had been treated, had tended to accustom the people to ridicule pretensions which had no solid foundation in physical force. The troops of the republic all but avowed that their obedience was given to their generals rather than to the state, and the nobility dared not appeal to them for the support of established institutions. They were compelled to trust to the irregular levies of their more headstrong partisans, such as Milo, thereby encouraging the increasing contempt for law and order. They made a desperate effort to maintain their influence by wholesale corruption. They placed their reliance upon their immense patronage, on the spoil of the provinces, the leasing of the revenues, the sale of justice in the public tribunals. But the proconsuls, who had originally been sent to the provinces to break their fall from the highest office of the state, now returned, year by year, from their governments with wealth too great for a private station, with ambition whetted by conquest or plunder, and with a retinue of followers enriched in their service, and devoted to their interest in defiance of patriotic or party ties. Lastly, they tried direct bribery, in buying the suffrages of the popular assemblies, or of the judges in political trials; but in this field also they were met by the enormous resources of private speculators, who outbid them in largesses, and still more in promises. The unbridled licentiousness of private citizens had still an advantage over the most unscrupulous government.

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 13. 15., ad Div. vii. 6—8.

² Cic. ad Att. iv. 15. He was attacked by the anti-Cæsarean party: "Servilius edixit ut adesset." The charge is not specified.

³ Cic. ad Div. (in a letter to P. Lentulus. Sept. A.U. 700), i. 9.

The proceedings of the consular candidates for the year 701 afforded an instance of this licentiousness beyond all former example. The struggle was carried on without intermission

Corrupt proceedings of the consular candidates for the year
A.U. 701.

through the latter half of the year preceding, the competitors themselves contriving every possible means of delay, in the hope of thwarting each other's interests or promoting their own. Pompeius beheld the postponement of the elections with ill-disguised satisfaction, and secretly fomented the confusion.¹ The candidates were four in number, Memmius, Domitius Calvinus, Æmilius Scaurus, and Valerius Messala. The first two formed a coalition, and made an engagement with the actual consuls, to procure for them, if elected, whatever provinces they desired as the price of their influence. They had witnesses, two of them consulars and three augurs, already suborned to swear that they had been present, the former when the senate made the requisite decree, the latter when the same was ratified by the act of the popular assembly.² But Pompeius, anxious to break up an alliance which threatened to carry every thing before it, found means to induce Memmius to disclose this infamous transaction, and, when he had thus ruinously compromised his associates, to abandon proposes to bring them to trial. his own views and adopt the policy of the triumvirs.³ The senate, more mortified than ashamed, was compelled to institute an inquiry into the affair. It adopted a mode of procedure which was termed a Silent Judgment, the nature of which was that the sentence was not to be pronounced till after the election had taken place. But this manœuvre, by which the nobles hoped to save appearances, at the same time that they secured the election which it was their object to hasten, proved unsuccessful. Q. Scævola, one of the tribunes

The senate

¹ Cic. ad Att. iv. 15. : "Pompeius fremit, queritur, Scauro studet; sed utrum fronde an mente dubitatur."

² Cic. ad Att. iv. 15 : "Cum Memmio consules Domitium conjunxerunt quâ pactio epistolæ committere non audeo" (comp. iv. 18.).

³ He expected that Pompeius, as dictator, would give him the consulship through the recommendation of Cæsar. Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 2., ad Att. iv. 18.

acting not in the interests of Pompeius, but with the approbation, according to Cicero, of the best and most upright men of the day¹, had no faith in the justice either of the senatorial decision or of the tribunals before which all the candidates were now cited by several prosecutors² to answer for their notorious bribery. The prerogative century, which gave the first vote at the election, and the example of which, it seems, might be relied upon to carry with it the voices of the rest³, had been bought, it was said, at the price of ten millions of sesterces. In order to meet this enormous profusion, the candidates borrowed of the capitalists in the most reckless manner. The interest which money fetched, on so unprecedented a demand, rose at once from four per cent., a rate sufficiently exorbitant, to eight per cent. per month. Scævola interposed to prevent any assembly of the comitia for the election of consuls, and the year passed without the appointment of any chief magistrates for that which was to follow

The elections are stopped by the intervention of a tribune.

Nothing could be more favourable to the views of Pompeius, according to all human calculation, than the paralysis which was thus gradually stealing over the vital powers of the constitution. Some great measure of state reform seemed evidently to be required, and the circumstances of the time, no less than the well-known practice of the commonwealth, pointed to the selec-

Death of Julia in the summer of the year 700.

¹ Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 3. : "Comitiorum quotidie singuli dies tolluntur obnuntiationibus, magnâ voluntate bonorum."

² Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 2. : "De ambitu postulati sunt omnes qui consulatum petunt." Comp. ad Qu. Fr. ii. 15. 16., ad Att. iv. 15.

³ The prerogative century was chosen by lot from the hundred and ninety-three which constituted the whole number, to give its decision first. Cicero, pro Flanc. 20. : "Centuria prærogativa tantum habet auctoritatis, ut nemo unquam prior eam tulerit quin renuntiatus sit." A first sight or first sound had great influence on the superstitious feelings of the Romans.

tion of a single personage, the foremost in the state, a man of approved judgment and courage, a man of acknowledged popularity, to whom so responsible a charge should be freely confided. But while the progress of events, as far as they were susceptible of being directed or moulded by dexterity and cunning, was thus quietly advancing the cherished views of the triumvir, other incidents beyond his control were preparing the way for new combinations, never yet forecast in his councils, and fatal to all his calculations. It was in the year 699, as has been already mentioned, that a sudden alarm gave a shock to his wife Julia, which brought on premature labour, and broke the strength of her constitution. In the summer of the year 700¹ she died in childbed, nor did the infant survive to perpetuate the union of the Pompeian and Julian houses.² The Romans long turned with fond regret to the memory of one who might have mediated between the father and his son-in-law, and assuaged the personal rivalry which overthrew their national liberties. Their sorrow, brooding over its object and playing with its own moody fancies, remembered the ancient legend of the Sabine women, who saved the state by rushing between the armed ranks of their fathers and their husbands.¹ It is natural and becoming for parents to acquiesce in the wishes of their children, and yield with the dignity of age to the more passionate decisions of youth. But in the present case all such feelings were reversed. The father was the younger in years, and inferior in position; the passion and spirit of movement were his: the husband could yield the more easily and the more gracefully of the two. The only result we can contemplate from the prolonged existence and fruitfulness of this ill-fated union is that Pompeius would have gradually succumbed under Cæsar's influence, instead of throwing himself repentantly, when once released from the rash connexion, into the arms of the aristocracy he had outraged. As it was, the union of Pompeius with Julia may furnish us with more pleasing ideas of his character than we obtain from the observation of other parts of his career. The ferocity of his earlier years, however much it was tempered by the prosperity of his middle age, would hardly allow us to suppose him so amiable in domestic life as appears in the account we have received of his intercourse with Julia. Though celebrated for her beauty as well as her accomplishments, and younger than her husband by twenty-three years, she devoted herself to him with rare affection, while his attachment to her was engrossing even to weakness. Such an instance of conjugal fidelity was rare, and might deserve to be commemorated by unusual distinctions. But it afforded the citizens an opportunity for displaying their devotion to Cæsar; and it was perhaps with no other view that they forbade the remains of Julia to ¹ Vell. ii. 47.: "Concordiae pignus Julia." Lucan, i. 114.:

¹ The date may be fixed approximately from a passage in Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 1. 5. He received a letter from Cæsar in Britain on the xi. Kal. Oct., in which allusion was made to the death of his daughter. Now xi. Kal. Oct. = Sept. 20. A.U. 700 of the unreformed calendar = Aug. 25. B.C. 54. A letter might travel, it appears, between Britain and Rome in 20 days. Accordingly, Julia must have died at least 40 days before Cæsar's letter above mentioned could reach Cicero, that is, not later than Aug. 9, A.U. 700, or July 16. B.C. 54. Plutarch is evidently wrong in saying that the news reached Cæsar immediately upon his return, καταλαμβάνει γράμματα μέλλοντα διαπλεῖν πρὸς αὐτόν (Cæs. 23); but it is on his authority, I conceive, that Fischer states that Julia died in September (Röm. Zeitt.). It may be well to remind the reader that in the unreformed calendar August (Sextilis) had 29 days, and September a like number.

² Plut. Cæs. 23., Pomp. 53.; Val. Max. iv. 6. 4. Liv. Epit. cxi.

"Quod si tibi fata dedissent

Majores in luce moras, tu sola furentem
Inde virum poteras, atque hinc retinere parentem;
Armatasque manus excusso jungere ferro, Ut generos socris mediæ juxxere Sabinae."

rest in the mausoleum of her Alban villa, and insisted upon honouring them with public obsequies in the Field of Mars.¹

¹ Plut. Pomp. 53. The consul Domitius attempted to prevent this pretended tribute of regard to the deceased, which he evidently considered was meant to reflect honour upon her father; but the people were not to be controlled even by the interdict of the tribunes. Dion, xxxix. 64.

CHAPTER X.

Cæsar's fourth Campaign, A.U. 699.—Invasion of Belgium by German Tribes.—Cæsar drives them beyond the Rhine.—Crosses that river, and chastises the Sicambri.—He invades Britain.—Cæsar's fifth Campaign, A.U. 700.—He invades Britain a second time with larger forces.—Crosses the Thames, and defeats Cassivellaunus.—Receives hostages and tribute, and retires.—Revolt of the Gauls.—Destruction of two legions in Belgium.—Courageous resistance of Q. Cicero.—Cæsar's sixth Campaign, A.U. 701.—He makes an incursion beyond the Rhine.—Destruction of the Eburones.—Defence of Aduatuca.—Pacification of Belgium.

THE Gauls lay prostrate at Cæsar's feet; the flower of almost every people had fallen in the vain attempt to maintain its liberty; the national assemblies were terrified by the frightful punishments which the conqueror had inflicted upon them, and their counsels were guided or distracted by Roman agents established throughout their cities.¹ Moreover, the mutual enmities of their tribes prevented much intercourse and discussion among them, and the four great divisions into which the country was split, the Belgian, the Aquitanian, and those of which the Ædui and the Veneti respectively took the lead, maintained little sympathy with one another. But it is not to be supposed that any of them were content with their position or satisfied with their new masters. No one was more fully aware of the hollowness of their submission than Cæsar himself. They were anxiously watching an opportunity for shaking off the yoke; but instead of entering frankly into a

State of Gaul
at the commencement of
the year 699.

¹ Cæs. B.G. vii. 5.

national confederation for their common object, they were waiting, each in sullen silence, for the chances that might occur in their favour.

Meanwhile, the Menapii had little time to exult in the withdrawal of the Roman legions. Movement of the Usipetes and Tenc-
theri. A new enemy suddenly assailed them from an opposite quarter. The Usipetes and Tenctheri were two German tribes situated on the lower course of the Rhine, to the north and south of the Lippe respectively.¹ For some time past they had been hard pressed by the Suevi, who, as we have seen, were at this time pursuing a victorious career, in which they had extended their dominions from the Hercynian forest to the frontier of Gaul,² and had only been checked within that territory by the invincible prowess of the Roman armies under their distinguished commander. Confined in that direction, they now turned northward, and the tribes above mentioned were soon reduced to the last extremity of barbarian races, that of migrating in a body, and occupying new settlements by force of arms.³ Accordingly, they fell upon the Menapii beyond the Rhine in a mass estimated at four hundred and thirty thousand souls. The Menapii fled precipitately from their seats on the right bank of that river, and sought refuge with their kinsmen established on the Gaulish side. Thus united, the whole tribe presented a bolder front to the invaders, and defended the passage of the broad and rapid stream with energy and success. The Suevi had next recourse to stratagem. They retired to a distance, enticed the fugitives to recross the river, in order to return to their former homes; then, suddenly wheeling round, they attacked and slaughtered them, and effected their passage in the same barks in which the others had just arrived. The Germans were once more established on the left bank of the Rhine. At any other time, almost the whole of Gaul from the north to the south might have been roused to meet and repulse its hereditary enemies. Even the ancient kinsmen of the invaders in Belgium might have leaped forth to defend their adopted country. But at that moment far different views occupied the minds of the Gaulish people. On the one hand, those who crouched the most supinely under the Roman yoke began already to entertain without abhorrence the fatal reasoning that the Romans, being now masters of the country, were responsible for its defence. On the other, a still greater number were indifferent to an invasion which could have no worse consequence to Gaul than that of giving it a change of rulers. But still there were not a few who hoped that the impending contest might weaken both the rival powers, and thus offer an opportunity of eventual triumph to the national cause. Such were the secret hopes of many who now flocked to Cæsar's standard, and filled his camp with brave but faithless auxiliaries.

¹ Mœb. in Cæs. iv. 1.; Münner, iii. 153.; Zeuss, 90.

² The seats of the Suevi in the time of Cæsar lay principally in the interior of Germany, to the east of the Sicambri and Ubii, bordering on the Hercynian forest, which separated them from the Cherusci. (Cæs. B.G. vi. 10.) They are sometimes represented as a single tribe, sometimes as a collection of tribes. (Tac. Germ. 38.) The Chatti and Hermunduri of Tacitus seem to share their territory at a later period.

³ Cæs. B.G. iv. 4; Dion, xxxix. 47, 48; Oros. vi. 20, 21.

The proconsul left Lucca in all haste, before his usual time of departure, when he learnt from his legates the state of affairs¹, and that some Gaulish tribes had even invited the invaders into Belgium, and offered to receive them as friends and deliverers. It was still mid-winter when he crossed the difficult passes of the Alps, convened a general assembly of the states, and,

Cæsar meets the invading
tribes.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 6.

dissembling his acquaintance with their sentiments or acts, laid before them the position of their country as a matter of national concern. They decreed him all the supplies and reinforcements he demanded, and with his new recruits he marched straight to the point at which the Usipetes and Tenctheri were assembled. They had crossed the Rhine, and were now spreading themselves along the valley of the Meuse, penetrating far to the south of the Menapian territories into those of their German kinsmen, the Eburones and Condrusi¹. The success with which their enterprise had thus far been crowned raised their spirits and imparted to their language a vain-glorious tone little in accordance with their condition as a defeated and fugitive horde. They sent deputies to the Roman general, offering him his choice of peace or war. It was the custom, they said, of their nation never to decline the combat with an enemy who challenged them: however, they had gained their immediate object; they had found the settlements they sought; with the Romans they had no quarrel; they were content to remain upon the soil they had seized; all they claimed was the right to do so unmolested. They proclaimed aloud the valour by which these acquisitions had been so rapidly made, and ended by declaring that they yielded in strength and bravery to no nation under the sun, excepting only the Suevi, whom the gods themselves could not withstand.² Cæsar replied, as was his wont, by claiming it as the province and duty of a Roman proconsul to protect the Gauls against all external enemies. He would hold no intercourse or discussion with any foreign nation while it occupied an inch of Gallic soil. With what face could they, who were unable to maintain their own possessions, presume to assert a right to those of others? He condescended to point out to them that at this moment the Ubii, another Rhenish tribe, were in want of allies to defend them against the encroachments of the Suevi; a lateral movement would bring them to the spot in a few days or hours; he would not oppose their recrossing the river peaceably, and establishing themselves in that district as a garrison against the advance of their common enemies. He further promised to obtain the consent of the Ubii to this arrangement.

¹ These people dwelt on the northern borders of the modern duchy of Luxembourg

² Cæs. B.G. iv. 7.

The first object of Cæsar's policy at this moment was to convince the Gauls that they were perfectly secure from foreign invasion under the powerful protection of Rome.

Cæsar confers
with the German invaders.

To effect this it was necessary to assume a tone of the loftiest defiance towards the Germans, and to be fully prepared to act in accordance with it. But he had before him a formidable enemy; the desperate valour of barbarian armies had too often broken the legions to allow a prudent general to risk a mortal combat with them without absolute necessity, and the Germans were still regarded by the Roman soldier with more than usual apprehension. It was far wiser to consolidate the forces of the opponents of the Suevi beyond the Rhine, than ultimately to aid the views of that encroaching power by desolating and depopulating the frontiers. The moderation which Cæsar displayed, supported as it was by his known character for uncompromising resolution, cooled the fervid audacity of the German orators. They agreed to lay his proposals before the council of their tribe, and contented themselves with requiring that he, on his part, should suspend his advance for three days, until an answer could be returned. But Cæsar sternly refused even this short respite. He knew that a part of the enemy's cavalry had been detached to make a foray in the country of the Ambivariti, and was resolved to allow no time for their return, if the matter should come to blows.¹ He continued his march, and arrived within twelve miles of the barbarian quarters, when the deputies hastily returned, in vain entreated him to halt, and could only obtain from him a promise that he would restrain his cavalry, already in advance, from commencing hostilities on that day. The deputies pressed for a truce for three days, that a communication might be made to the Ubii; but this request he regarded as an evasion. Four miles further on he expected to find water, and there he had determined to pitch his camp, and no remonstrances could induce him to swerve from this resolution. Finally, he required a more numerous deputation of the German chieftains to meet him on the morrow at that spot. At the same time he sent orders to the officers in command of his cavalry to abstain from hostilities, and, even if attacked, to make no reprisals until he should come up with them.

According to Cæsar's narrative of these transactions, it would appear that the German cavalry posted in advance of their camp, as soon as they perceived the Roman squadrons approaching, charged them without regard to the truce which had been thus concluded.² The number of the Germans he states at eight hundred, the rest of their horse being absent foraging. That of the Romans, or rather of the Gaulish auxiliaries, amounted to five thousand. Relying on the faith of the treaty, they were totally unprepared for the onset, and easily thrown into confusion even by a handful of assailants. Defending themselves feebly and partially they suffered a loss of seventy-four men, and were routed and pursued as far as the

Great battle
between the Romans and Germans
total : out of the latter.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 9. ² Cæs. B.G. iv. 12.

head of the advancing columns of the main army. Cæsar, affecting just indignation at this flagrant infringement of the truce, determined to take signal vengeance on its perpetrators. He would no longer consent to an instant's delay, which he was now convinced was only held out as a lure to entrap him. He was aware, moreover, how injurious an effect the report of this check, however slight, would have upon his Gaulish auxiliaries and upon the nations in his rear. Betrayed himself, he scrupled not, for the safety of his army and the province, to requite the barbarians with treachery deeper and more destructive than their own. Accordingly, when, the next morning, the German deputation, consisting of a large number of their chieftains, met him with protestations of regret for the occurrence of the day before, and with disclaimers of their error or their guilt, he threw them at once into irons, and gave orders for immediate advance against the enemy, unprepared for combat and deprived of their commanders. The Germans, thus taken by surprise, had not time even to form their rude array. They could only protract an ineffectual resistance by rallying about their waggons. They sent off their women and children in all haste, in the hope that they at least might escape the fury of an enemy whom they despaired of overcoming. But Cæsar, perceiving this movement, ordered his cavalry to pursue and attack the unarmed fugitives, and as there were but few German horse to oppose them, his directions were carried into effect with ease and with ruthless ferocity. At the sight of this carnage the barbarians lost all heart, broke their ranks, and betook themselves to flight. Their rear being occupied by the Roman cavalry, it would seem that they must have escaped from the field on their left flank, on which side the Rhine lay, apparently at no great distance. Their flight was arrested by that deep and rapid stream at the point of its confluence with another, the Meuse, according to Cæsar's text, but more probably the Moselle.¹ Here a rally took place, but only for an instant; in another moment the multitude plunged headlong into the waters, and were swept away by the wintry flood. The Romans had only a few men wounded, not one was killed. The great mass of the Germans, not less probably than one hundred and eighty thousand in number, perished, we are assured, altogether. To the captive deputation the conqueror behaved with contemptuous clemency. He granted them leave to depart; but they dreaded the enmity of the Gauls, whom they had injured and insulted, and preferred remaining in the Roman camp.

Cæsar sent the news of this signal triumph to Rome, and the senate, after reading his despatch, decreed with acclamation a supplicatio, or national thanksgiving to the gods. Cato rose indignantly to deprecate the bestowal of such honours on an occasion so unworthy. He denounced the conduct of Cæsar as perfidious and degrading to the Roman name. He described his treatment of the Germans as a violation of the pledged faith of the republic, and proposed rather a ¹ There is great difficulty in fixing the site of this battle. Cæsar's text undoubtedly speaks of the confluence of the Rhine and Meuse (Mosa); but the Germans, it will be remembered, only required three days to send a message to the Ubii (on the right bank of the Rhine, between Cologne and Coblenz), and receive their deliberate answer, which is quite inconsistent with such an explanation. They had penetrated at least to the frontiers of the Treviri, according to Cæsar and Dion (xxxix. 47.), and there is no reason to suppose that they made any retreat before the advance of the Romans. Cluverius thought that we should read Mosella for Mosa; and, notwithstanding Mannert's criticism, I am disposed to believe either that our text is in fault, or that the author of the Commentaries committed a slip of memory. Mannert allows that the junction of the Meuse and Wahal took place at the same spot formerly as it does now, only eighty miles from the sea (ii. i. 192.). The country in that neighbourhood was at this time quite inaccessible to the Romans.

Treachery
imputed to Cæsar in the Senate. Cato proposes that he should be delivered to the enemy.

national humiliation to avert the wrath of heaven, and to prove to the barbarians that the Romans disowned treachery in their generals even when successful. He declared that Cæsar ought to be given up to the Germans in expiation of the national crime. Examples of such a course were not altogether wanting. At least two instances of the kind could be mentioned: the one when Q. Fabius and Cn. Apronius were delivered over to the Apolloniatae for having slain their ambassadors¹; the other, when L. Minucius and L. Manlius were surrendered to the Carthaginians in atonement for a similar crime.² But however it might have been in the sterner days of the republic, it was neither to the public virtue of the senate nor to its religious feelings that such an appeal could at this period be seriously addressed. A few of the proconsul's personal enemies, who had all Cato's bitterness without his singleness of purpose, might applaud and stimulate his frantic violence; but a reasonable view of the transaction might combine with a sense of general or private interest to prevent the great majority of the assembly from yielding acquiescence to his extravagant demands.

A fair consideration of the real facts of the case could not certainly be expected from statesmen so blinded by political animosity.³ At all events, as regards the internal probability of Cæsar's account of the transaction, by which the first infraction of the treaty is imputed to the Germans, there seems no reason to dispute it on the ground that their number was so much the smaller. The cavalry opposed to them was Gaulish, and its indisposition to the cause in which it was engaged might be

Credibility of Cæsar's own account.

¹ Liv. Epit. xv.; Dion, Excerpt. Vales. 43.; Val. Max. vi. 6. 5.

² Liv. xxxviii. 42.; Val. Max. vi. 6. 3.; comp. Cic. pro Cæs. 34.: “Ut religione solvatur civitas civis Romanus traditur.” presumed upon. It was also unprepared on the faith of the treaty. The event proved that the calculation of the Germans was not incorrect. The larger squadron retreated in confusion before the lesser. Such could not have been the case had the Gallo-Romans been the first to attack with such superior force. The charge therefore of deliberate perfidy on Cæsar's part seems to be groundless. That he was well pleased to make use of his enemies' crime, which a slight explanation might have sufficiently atoned for, cannot be denied. He might fairly have exacted harder terms in consideration of it; but his time was precious and his situation precarious. He allowed himself an extreme measure of retaliation; and if he reaped the advantage, he certainly lost all the glory of the engagement which followed.

³ The story is alluded to by Suetonius (Jul. 25.), and more distinctly mentioned by Plutarch (Cæs. 22.).

Various migratory hordes had crossed the Rhine before the Usipetes and Tenctheri, and whether they had established themselves on the Gallic soil, or had perished in their wanderings, faint and vague had been the rumours of their fate which had reached the ears of those they had left behind. But Cæsar was determined that the German people should know what had become of this last swarm of invaders, how the two tribes had fallen in one great day of slaughter, and who were the fatal enemies who had thus cut short their career. His authority in Gaul depended in no slight degree upon his checking the roving spirit of the free men beyond the Rhine, and convincing the discontented within that boundary that the arm of the republic was long enough to reach their most distant auxiliaries. The pretext which he puts forward himself for his incursion into Germany, that of pursuing the wretched remnant of the Usipetes, the cavalry which had been absent from the battle, seems hardly worthy of consideration. Nor is it much more to the purpose that the Ubii are

Cæsar proposes to make an incursion into Germany.

said to have solicited his assistance against the Suevi. It was the business of a Roman proconsul always to put forth a legitimate pretext for an act of aggression; but the real motive was often kept in the back ground, and doubtless Cæsar on the present occasion had further and deeper views, when he resolved to cross the frontier and show himself in all the majesty of Roman military array to the proud warriors before whom the tribes of the Rhine were trembling.¹

He first required the Sicambri to deliver up the fugitives who had just eluded his grasp. They replied with firmness that as he denied the right of the Germans to interfere in the affairs of Gaul, they for their part were prepared to dispute his authority over a people of their own nation. This was a sufficient pretext for taking umbrage, and Cæsar gave orders to effect the passage of the river. He chose a spot near the present town of Neuwied², a few miles below Coblenz, where the banks of the river present a space of level ground on both sides, and there he built a bridge, partly for greater security, partly perhaps to impress the natives with a higher sense of the dignity and power of the republic. The stream was broad and rapid, and the engineers applied all their skill and ingenuity, under his special directions, to construct a solid edifice. The work was completed in the short space of ten days.¹ But after all this labour, Cæsar made no further use of it than to transport his army over and back again, after he had spent a few weeks in ravaging the country of the Sicambri, and showing himself as a friend and ally to the Ubii. The Suevi, indeed, collected in large numbers, and prepared for battle. The proconsul, however, was satisfied with the demonstration he had made, and took no measures to bring on an engagement. When he again reached the left bank he broke down his bridge, and hastened away to engage in another enterprise of a similar nature, and probably with similar political views.² This was no other than the famous invasion of Britain, an enterprise to which we owe our first introduction into the history of Europe and of the world.

His short campaign beyond the Rhine.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 16.

² This was the spot where Augustus afterwards constructed a stone bridge, the foundations of which are said to be still visible. It corresponds with the situation of the Ubii. Supposing the recent battle to have taken place near the confluence of the Rhine and Moselle, we might expect Cæsar to follow up his victory by crossing the river in the immediate neighbourhood. For these reasons I have preferred the locality mentioned in the text. Some indeed have supposed from the statement of Florus (iii. 18.) that he crossed the Moselle as well as the Rhine in his first expedition against the Germans, that his first passage of the latter river was in the neighbourhood of Bingen. But this will not correspond with the position of the Ubii or Sicambræ, which certainly lay more to the north. It is more likely that Florus imagined him to have crossed the Moselle from the right bank. See Mannert, II. i. 256.

The campaigns of Cæsar in Belgium could not fail to make him acquainted with the existence and character of the inhabitants of the great island which lay within sight of its coasts. It was indeed from their allies on the opposite shore that his enemies had drawn no inconsiderable resources. Questioned as to the relations subsisting between themselves and the natives of Britain, they asserted that many of their own race had emigrated

Cæsar inquires into the character and condition of the Britons.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 17.; Plut. Cæs. 22. The author of the Précis des Guerres de César, p. 61., compares this bridge with that which Bertrand threw across the Danube near Vienna for Napoleon in 1809. He shows the great superiority of the modern engineers, both as regards the difficulty of the undertaking, and the speed with which it was completed. Napoleon's bridge required ten times the amount of labour, and was finished in only twice the number of days. This author supposes Cæsar to have crossed at Cologne. Among his motives for this expedition may be reckoned the advantage of keeping his army in training and occupation. The building of the bridge may have been undertaken as an exercise in engineering, and a wholesome employment.

² Cæsar was the first Roman who crossed the Rhine. Suet. Jul. 25.; Dion, xxxix. 50.

from Gaul during the preceding century, and established themselves beyond the white cliffs just visible in the horizon. They spoke of a population believed by them to be aboriginal, upon whom they had intruded themselves, and in whose seats they had gradually fixed their abodes.¹ This primitive people they described as peculiarly rude and barbarous in their social habits.² They were almost destitute of clothing, and took a grotesque pleasure in painting or tattooing their bodies with blue woad.³ They admitted a regulated community of women.⁴ They lived almost entirely on milk and flesh, the toil or skill required even for fishing was distasteful to them⁵; and dwelling apart, or congregating in a few hovels, with a wooden stockade round them, and screened by forests, mountains, or morasses, they possessed nothing which could deserve the name of a city.⁶ It was in the interior or north of the country apparently that the rudest tribes used the scythed chariot in war. Cæsar, who never penetrated very far from the coast, does not seem to have met with it. We may conclude that the earliest known inhabitants of the island were akin to the Gaelic di-

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 12

² Cæs. B.G. v. 14.

³ Cæsar says, “Omnes se Britanni vitro inficiunt.” If this is meant to extend to the Belgian tribes in Britain, we must suppose the custom to have been partially adopted by them in imitation of their ruder neighbours. Solinus says, “Regionem partim tenent barbari quibus per artifices plagarum figuræ jam inde a pueris variæ animalium effigies incorporantur,” (c. 25.).

⁴ A contemporary Welsh scholar, Archdeacon Williams, conjectures that this statement may have arisen from a misconception of the provision of the British law of inheritance, by which a patrimony was divided equally among the sons, and after the death of the last survivor redistributed equally among the descendants in the second generation. See his interesting essay on “Claudia and Pudens.” p. 33. But I cannot trace any point of similarity between Cæsar’s statement, however erroneous it may be, and the law or custom here described.

⁵ Dion, lxxvi. 12. A fatal characteristic of their Gaelic descendants even at this day.

⁶ Cæs. B.G. v. 21.; Strab. iv.

vision of the Celtic family, and that its possession was disputed with them from a very remote period by the subsequent intrusion of the Kymry.¹ The latter brought with them, besides the language and the physiological characteristics which still remain so strongly marked in a part of the island, the Druidical religion, which has already been described. It was perhaps the fixed and exclusive qualities belonging to an insular institution which gave the British Druidism so great an ascendancy among the Gaulish tribes, and caused them to regard it as the purest expression of their mystic theology. The Belgians, who were the latest settlers on the British shore, seem to have been easily reclaimed from the wild habits of their forest life by the civilizing influences of the coast and a navigable river. Cæsar remarks that the inhabitants of the corner nearest to Gaul were the farthest advanced in social cultivation, and the extraordinary rapidity with which the eastern ports sprang into commercial celebrity discovers a natural aptitude in the race which their subsequent history has so fully confirmed.

A close connexion was maintained between the Belgian tribes located in the island and the kinsmen whom they had left behind.² Some of the kings of the continental states still claimed a kind of sovereignty over the emigrants beyond the sea. Cæsar complained that his enemies in Gaul had frequently received succour from an invisible arm stretched forth to them from these remote colonies. The example of freedom and this expression of sympathy were, at all events, dangerous to the tranquillity of his new conquests.

Their proximity to Gaul dangerous to the security of the Roman conquest.

¹ See Thierry, Gaulois, Introd. p. xci.

² Cæsar informs us that several of the British states derived their name and origin from Gaulish, especially the Belgian tribes (B.G. v. 12.) Ptolemy mentions the names of the Parisii, Atrebates, Belgæ, Menapii. The Parisii were Belgian, in Strabo's extended signification of the term, but not in Cæsar's.

It seemed a measure of political importance to strike a blow at a people who might be supposed to plume themselves on their insular security, and to carry, at least, the terror of the Roman arms across the barrier which Nature herself had raised against them. A century earlier a proconsular army had turned back with reverence or dismay from the shores of the Atlantic. They had reached, it was surmised, the verge of the habitable world, and profanely approached the frontiers of night and oblivion. But Cæsar's legions and Cæsar himself were alike inaccessible to such feelings; the general sought an arena for martial exercises, the soldier dreamed of hoarded gold and jewels; and if the temper of either admitted of finer sensibilities, the billows of the western ocean might inspire him with ambition rather than with awe.¹

After recrossing the Rhine, the proconsul fixed his quarters on the coast of the Morini; for it was only in the remoter districts that this tribe could maintain its independence, and the mere rumour of his intended invasion of the island raised among them such a notion of his boldness and power, that they hastened, for the most part, at once to make a voluntary submission.² The Roman general was well pleased to receive them into favour, and obtain from them the assistance and information he needed. He spent some weeks in collecting his naval armaments, despatched an officer named Volusenus to explore the opposite coast, and

Cæsar prepares to invade Britain.

¹ "Decimus Brutus aliquanto latius Celticos Lusitanosque et omnes Gallæciæ populos, formidatumque militibus flumen Oblivionis (comp. Liv. Epit. lv.); peragratoque victor Oceani litore, non prius signa convertit, quam cadentem in maria solem, obrutumque aquis ignem non sine quodam sacrilegii metu et horrore deprehendit." Florus, ii. 17. The Romans ridiculed Cæsar's vanity in dignifying the shallow straits with the name of the Ocean. Lucan, ii. 571.

"Oceanumque vocans incerti stagna profundi Territa quæsitis ostendit terga Britannis."

² Cæs. B.G. iv. 21, 22.

commissioned Commius, a chieftain on whom he had conferred the sovereignty of the Atrebates, to repair to his friends and kinsmen in the island, and represent to them in proper colours the magnitude of the Roman power, and the advantages of alliance or submission. The rumour of his preparations had already alarmed the Belgians in the south of Britain, and various embassies from them reached his camp, with the offer of hostages for their good-will and fidelity.

The season had already advanced too far to allow the Roman general to contemplate the conquest of any part of the island in this campaign, if indeed he entertained any such ulterior view. His object was to obtain a personal acquaintance with the country, its chiefs and people, to thrust himself in some way into their affairs, and establish such relations with them as might afford a convenient pretext for further interference at a future time. For his immediate designs it seemed sufficient to collect a force of two legions and a few hundred cavalry. The former were destined to embark in eighty transports at the Portus Itius¹, the latter at a spot eight miles further to the east. The embarkation of both divisions was to take place simultaneously, on the morning of the 26th of August, soon after midnight, during the third watch. This

¹ The point on the French coast from which Cæsar sailed has not been determined with certainty. We may pass over the unconscionable nationality of some Flemish writers (see Bast. Antiq. Rom. Gaul. p. 264.); but Boulogne, Ambleteuse, Witsand and Calais, still contend for the honour. It was not Calais, because Cæsar would not in that case surely have sent his cavalry further to the east to make the passage. Boulogne, which became at a later period the usual place of embarkation for Britain, was known by another name, Gessoriacum. There is probably an error of east for west, where Ptolemy places this spot east of the Ικιον ἄκρον. (See Mannert, II. i. 186.) The question seems therefore to be narrowed to the two ports of Ambleteuse and Witsand. In deciding between them we may be guided partly by the similarity of the names Iccius, or Itius, and Witsand, and partly by the fact that in the middle ages Witsand was the port from which

He crosses the straits of Dover.

seems to have been the commencement of the flood-tide, which runs along the coasts of the channel in a north-easterly direction. The proconsul embarked with the infantry, and proceeding slowly, possibly that he might fall in with the cavalry transports, found himself at ten in the morning off the cliffs of Dover. The expected squadron, however, was detained by wind, or accident, and the spot itself offering some impediments, the invader determined to seek another landing-place. The sea is described here as running up into the land by a narrow creek overhung by heights, which completely commanded every approach¹, and were already crowded with the natives in arms. Accordingly, after waiting the greater part of the day for the arrival of his cavalry, the proconsul took the next flood-tide, aided by a favourable wind, and coasted northward a distance of seven or eight miles, which brought him to the open beach of Walmer or Deal.²

The movements of the Roman squadron were closely watched by the Britons from the heights, and by the time it had arrived at the spot where Cæsar proposed to draw up

The Romans
affect their landing.

the passage was commonly made. (See Ducange on Joinville's Memoirs, diss. xxvi.) Both are equally distant from the nearest point of the British coast. When Cæsar computes the length of the passage at 30 milcs, which is more than the distance from shore to shore, he may measure from his starting-place to his landing-place, viz. Deal. The Ικιον ἄκρον is probably Cap Grisnez. See Walckenaer, G. des G. ii. 268. With regard to the orthography of the Roman name, the MSS. of Cæsar read Itius, those of Ptolemy Ικιον. The form Iccius is a corruption of later writers. Bast, l. c.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 23. His expressions evidently describe a creek or estuary, and cannot refer to the promontory of the South Foreland. There is an ancient tradition at Dover that the sea formerly ran five or six miles up into the land there. Acad. des Sci. et Bell. Lett. de Bruxelles, iii. 1. (1770), quoted by Bast, Antiq. Rom. et Gaul.

² Cæs. l. c. : " Ventum et æstum nactus secundum." It has been much disputed whether the spot at which Cæsar landed lay to the east or west of Dover, at Deal or Hythe; but a close examination of his language seems to settle the question decisively. He came to his vessels, the beach was lined with an imposing array of warriors in their chariots, prepared to dispute his landing. The sea was too shallow to admit of the larger vessels approaching the land, and the barbarians rushed into the surge to reach their invaders. The war-galleys which drew less water were ordered to the flanks to dispel the host of assailants, and when they opened their batteries of missiles the Britons were thrown into disorder. The Romans, however, in the confusion incident to a mode of fighting with which they were not familiar, showed little alacrity in attacking the enemy, until the standard-bearer of the tenth legion leaped with his eagle into the waves, and summoned his comrades to the rescue.¹ Excited by the danger of their adored ensign, the soldiers threw themselves into the water, repulsed the barbarians, and made good their land-

Britain a little before the end of summer (exigua parte aestatis reliqua), and left it before the equinox. From Halley's calculations (see Phil. Trans. No. 193.) it is ascertained that there were two full moons in August of the year B.C. 55, on the 1st at noon, and on the 30th at midnight. The latter then must have been that which Cæsar noticed on the fourth night after his arrival (c. 29.). If the tide was at its height at midnight (30th—31st), it must have been so about 8 p.m. on the 26th. Accordingly, the tide began to flow on the afternoon of the 26th at 2 p.m., and this must have been the tide with which Cæsar left his moorings off Dover. As the flood-tide flows to the northward, such must have been the direction which he took, and a run of seven or eight miles would bring him precisely to the flat beach of Deal or Walmer. The only reason for believing him to have taken the opposite course is the expression of Dion, xxxix 51. : τοὺς προσμίξαντάς οἱ ἐς τὰ τενάγη ἀποβαίνοντι νικήσας, where τενάγη is supposed to indicate such marshes as are found between Hythe and Romney, but not on the other side. The word may, however, mean the soft beach washed by the tide. Dion also says that he sailed round a promontory, which cannot be reconciled with the notion of his going westward. [The discussion this subject has undergone, since the first publication of my work, by Prof. Airy, Mr. Lewin, and others, would induce me to speak now far less confidently upon it. I leave it, however, to the settlement which may be expected from the forthcoming Life of Cæsar, by the Emperor Napoleon, who is said to have caused it to be thoroughly examined.

—Jan. 1865.]

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 25—27.

ing. The fame of Caesar and his legions had gone before him, and when the Britons found themselves engaged hand to hand with the conquerors of Gaul, their courage failed. But the Romans, destitute as they were of cavalry, might have suffered severely from the vigorous attack of chariots and horsemen; and, however feeble was the resistance opposed to their landing, they were not in a condition to pursue, but hastened to secure the spot on which they had planted themselves by throwing up their earthworks. Before, however, even these first defences were completed an embassy arrived from the Britons, with the offer of hostages and humble protestations of submission. Commius, who had been seized and thrown into chains when he ventured to set foot in the island, was restored with many excuses to liberty. The Roman general complained of his hostile reception after offers of friendship and alliance; but he agreed to accept the overtures now proffered, together with the promised hostages.

But whether or not the Britons were sincere in the first terror of defeat, an accident which befel the foreign armament gave them courage to change their policy and break their faith.

Their fleet severely injured by a high tide.

The Roman cavalry, sailing at last on the fourth day after their leader's departure, were driven back by a violent wind. As their course lay towards the northwest, the gentle breeze with which they had hoped to effect their landing came probably from an easterly quarter. Before they had reached the Downs the wind freshened to a gale, and their vessels were rendered unmanageable. Some of them, indeed, succeeded in recovering the coast of Gaul, but others were carried through the straits far to the west, and narrowly escaped being cast away on distant points of the British coast.¹ At midnight the tide rose with the full moon and the strong east wind to an unusual height, such as the Romans, imperfectly acquainted with those seas, had never before witnessed. The war-vessels drawn up on the beach were covered with the waves and dashed in pieces, while the transports at anchor were torn from their moorings, and hurled upon the coast or against one another.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 28.

Thus the fleet was almost disabled, nor had the The Roman army harassed by the Britons. little army proper means for repairing it. Nor was the camp provided with grain for the winter. The Britons, who had noticed the smallness of the Roman force, and its want of supplies, now conceived the hope of cutting it off by famine, presuming that the entire loss of an army with its general would deter the Romans from repeating the enterprise. But they did not execute their plans skilfully. They made a sudden attack upon the seventh legion, which had been sent to forage, but was not yet beyond reach of assistance from the camp. Cæsar rushed forth to its rescue, and repulsed the assailants; but his experience of the treachery of the enemy, and the peril to which he was now daily exposed, made him the more anxious to withdraw from the island without delay. The equinox was also fast approaching, and the tempestuous weather which generally accompanies it. He was well pleased therefore at receiving a new offer of submission from the vacillating barbarians. He contented himself with imposing upon them double the number of hostages they had originally promised. Since the night of the storm he had laboured assiduously to refit his vessels, destroying, for the want of fresh materials, the most damaged, in order to repair the rest. He sailed soon after midnight some days before the equinox, that is to say, about three weeks from the time of his landing, taking the ebb-tide, which would then serve to carry him down the coast, and thence across into Gaul. Two vessels which could not make the appointed port were borne by the current further down the channel.¹

On his return from Britain, Cæsar detached Sabinius and Cotta to make an incursion into the country of the Menapii, which proved more successful than that of the year preceding, the dryness of the season having rendered the morasses accessible. At the same time, Labienus chastised the Morini, who had risen against the crews of the dispersed vessels. The Britons, as soon as they learned that the Romans had left their shores, neglected, with the exception of two only of their tribes, to send the promised hostages.² But at Rome the news of Cæsar's victories called forth unbounded acclamations, especially the vaunted success of his attack upon an unknown island, which struck their imaginations as an heroic exploit, while it inflamed their cupidity with the hopes of new and incalculable plunder.³ The avaricious dreams of the Romans ascribed hoards of plate and jewels to the rudest barbarians of the ancient world. Britain was reported to be rich in mines, at least of the inferior metals. Above all, the pearls of the Rutupian coast were celebrated for their supposed abundance and splendour, and became objects of especial desire.⁴ The breastplate

Transactions
of the re mainder of the year.
Cæsar goes into Illyricum.

¹ Cæs. B.G. iv. 36.: “Paulo infra delatæ sunt.” On reaching the coast of Gaul, the crews of these vessels were attacked by the Morini, and were within immediate reach of the main body, which had already disembarked. They came to shore therefore probably near Ambleteuse or Boulogne.

² Cæs. B.C. iv. 38.

³ Dion, xxxiv. 53. After disparaging the enterprise as unsuccessful he adds: τούτῳ γὰρ καὶ αὐτὸς ἰσχυρῶς ἐσεμνύνετο, καὶ οἱ οἴκοι Ῥωμαῖοι θαυμαστῶς ἐμεγαλύνοντο, κ. τ. λ.

⁴ Suet. Jul. 47.: “Britanniam petiisse spe margaritarum, quarum amplitudinem conferentem,” &c. Yet Pliny confesses that the pearls of Britain were, after all, “parvi et decolores” (H.N. ix. 57.), and set with these costly brilliants, which the conqueror afterwards dedicated to Venus Genetrix, the patroness and mother of his race, was no less agreeable to the eyes of the young nobility than to those of the goddess herself. A thanksgiving of twenty days was decreed in his honour, while he hastened, as usual, to the frontier of his province, to confer with his friends from Rome. Early, however, in the next year he visited Illyricum, the further district of his province, beset by predatory hordes, which had crossed the upper waters of the Save and Drave, and penetrated its Alpine boundary.¹ We observe the name of Julius impressed upon many spots in this vicinity: the Carnian Alps here take the appellation of Julian; a town immediately at their feet was denominated Julium Carnicum; and Forum Julii, still surviving in the modern Friuli, lay at no great distance, near the head of the Adriatic. It is not, however, to the great conqueror that these appellations can be traced; for he could not possibly have crossed the Alps in the winter season, and carried the sword into the native valleys of the Pirustæ in the Tyrol; nor did he remain long enough in the neighbourhood to found cities or colonies.²

During Cæsar's absence preparations were in progress in the ports and camps of northern Gaul for a second invasion of Britain with a more powerful force. Six hundred trans-Great preparations for a second invasion of Britain in the spring, Tacitus adds: "Gignit oceanus margarita sed subfusca et liventia." (Agric. 12.).

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 1.; comp. Mannert, III. 547.

² The origin of these names remains in obscurity: See Mannert, III. 546., who supposes Forum Julii to have been founded by one of the Cæsarian family in a later generation, and the Alps to have received their local designation from the city. The epithet Julian is first given to these mountains by Tacitus, Hist. iii. 8. Livy, who speaks of the locality, makes no mention of such a name. Ammianus (xxxvi. 16.) says: "Usque ad radices Alpium Julianarum quas Venetas appellavit antiquitas." The Julian Alps known at this period were those afterwards denominated Cottian. See above p. 256.

ports were built, of a construction adapted to the shallow coasts and short chopping waves of the channel. The whole armament was appointed to assemble at the Portus Itius ; and Cæsar employed this short interval in menacing the Treviri, with whom he was incensed for their neglecting to attend the general meeting of the states, and intriguing with the Suevi. Two of their chieftains, Cingetorix and Indutiomarus were mutually aspiring to the supreme power. On the approach of the Roman army, the former hastened to make his submission ; the latter, thus anticipated, rashly summoned his troops and adherents. But soon repenting of this overt act, he sued for pardon, which Cæsar was easily persuaded to bestow. To Cingetorix, however, he displayed greater favour, taking his part, and conciliating to his views the principal men of the state. The Treviri returned to their obedience ; but the ambition of Indutiomarus was turned to bitter though suppressed hostility.¹

This affair being despatched, the whole disposable force of the proconsul was assembled at the Portus Itius.² He was attended by a body of four thousand Gaulish horse, officered by the flower of the native nobility, whom Cæsar proposed to carry with him, not less as hostages for the tranquillity of their country, the state of which was becoming daily more critical, than for the benefit of their military services. Among them was Dumnorix, the Æduan, whose good faith Cæsar justly distrusted, and who alarmed his countrymen by vaunting that the proconsul had promised to confer upon him the sovereignty of their nation. He was anxious to avoid accompanying the expedition, hoping, if left behind, to find an opportunity of forwarding his private projects of ambition. He studied to rouse

A.U. 700.
B.C. 54.
Cæsar's fifth campaign.

the fears of his fellow-chiefs, representing that the conqueror, not venturing to put them to death in their countrymen's presence, sought, in this distant campaign, the means of destroying them. The prevalence of north-west winds interposed a delay of several days, of which the Æduan made all the use in his power. At last, when the order for embarkment was given, he secretly escaped, with a few followers, from the camp. Cæsar immediately despatched horsemen to recapture the fugitive, dead or alive. He was overtaken, and the Gauls, who hated him no less than their Roman oppressors, slew him on the spot.¹ His attendants returned without further resistance to the Roman quarters.

The spring had not yet passed, when the Roman armament sailed for Britain. It consisted of five legions, and a proportionate number of cavalry, the importance of which force had been proved in the late expedition. Three legions were left under Labienus, to provide for the security of Gaul. The landing was effected without opposition at the same spot as in the preceding summer²; and Cæsar, leaving ten cohorts and three hundred horse, to protect his naval station, repaired with his main body to a place in the neighbourhood, where he constructed a camp for permanent occupation. This was the foundation, in all probability, of the famous station of Rutupiæ, or Richborough. The ruins of its gigantic defences attest to this day the extent and solidity of the Roman military works in our island. The Britons still declined to oppose the invaders; it was not till the army had advanced to the Banks of the Stour, twelve miles distant from its encampment, that it found a foe arrayed to dispute its further progress. But the Britons did

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 7.

² Cæs. B.G. v. 8.; Dion, xl. 1. The pretext for the invasion was the refusal of the Britons to send the stipulated number of hostages.

He escapes
from the camp, is pursued and slain.

Cæsar lands in Britain without opposition.

not place their reliance on the slow and narrow stream of a petty river; they had a camp of their own peculiar construction, a space cleared in the centre of a wood, and defended by the trunks of trees, to which they retreated on the first repulse, and whence it was difficult to dislodge them. When this was at last effected, Cæsar did not venture to pursue the rapid flight of their horsemen and chariots in a country unknown to him. An accident, which had again befallen his fleet, suddenly recalled him. A storm, as in the preceding expedition, had severely injured his vessels. It took several days of incessant labour to repair the damage, and then, at last, it was determined to draw up the whole armament on shore, and extend and strengthen the fortifications which defended it on the land side. Cæsar again advanced, and again encountered the natives at the passage of the river. Amidst their internal dissensions (for such seem to have prevailed among them to a greater extent than even among their neighbours on the continent), the Britons had embraced the resolution of trusting the conduct of their defence to one of their principal chieftains. His name was Cassivellaunus¹, and he ruled over the Trinobantes, the people of Middlesex, Hertford, and Essex. The British method of fighting was almost wholly on horseback or from chariots. The dexterity with which the barbarians managed these ponderous vehicles, the weight of their onset, and the rapidity of their retreat, baffled through the day the skill and vigour of the invaders. The Roman lines were shaken by repeated charges; the pilum stretched many a chieftain on the plain, but his steeds and empty car came bounding against the wall of steel.

The Britons, commanded by Cassivellaunus, make a brave resistance.

¹ This was the Roman orthography. Dion writes it Κασσονελλανός, approaching nearer to what was probably the real pronunciation, Caswallon or Cadwallon.

Repulsed, the flying squadrons were quickly beyond the reach of pursuit; the Gaulish cavalry were languid and inactive; it was by the steady endurance of the veteran infantry that victory was at last secured. The Britons lost the bravest of their combatants, together with their cumbrous materials of war. From that day the Britons never ventured again to attack Cæsar's legions in regular battle, but scattered themselves through the country, in the hope of wearing out their strength by repeated and desultory skirmishes.

Cæsar, however, kept his men well together, and refrained from partial engagements, while ^{They defend the line of the Thames.} he marched boldly into the heart of the country, to the banks of the Thames, behind which Cassivellaunus had retreated. It was necessary, in order to ford the river, to ascend above the highest point which the tide reaches; and the very spot where the passage was made may be conjectured with some confidence from early and constant tradition. A place known by the name of Coway Stakes, near the mouth of the Wey, is supposed to have derived its appellation from the palisades with which the Britons obstructed the bed and bank of the Thames¹, the remains of which were still visible, according to the testimony of Bede, in the eighth century.² The spot accords also sufficiently well with the distance of eighty miles from the sea, at which Cæsar places the frontier of Cassivellaunus's dominions.³

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 18.; Dion, xl. 3.

² Bede, Hist. of Brit. i. 2. Every narrator of these events feels bound to commemorate this cherished tradition. Compare Camden's Britannia, "Surrey." He states the depth of the water at that spot to be generally about six feet. Cæsar's passage was made in the middle of summer, and the season was remarkable for its drought: "Eo anno frumentum in Gallia propter siccitates angustius prævenerat." Cæs. B.G. v. 24.

³ Cæs. B.G. v. 11.

The swimming and fording of rivers were among the regular exercises of the Roman legionary. Though immersed up to his chin in water, he was expert in plying his hatchet against the stakes which opposed his progress, while he held his buckler over his head not less steadily than on dry land. Behind him a constant storm of stones and darts was impelled against the enemy from the engines which always accompanied the Roman armies.¹ The natives were driven from their position, and Cæsar marched upon the capital of the Trinobantes, which lay at no great distance.² The Trinobantes, over whom Cassivellaunus had usurped authority by the murder of its sovereign, were disposed to treat with the conqueror and abandon the tyrant to his fate. Their example was followed by several other states, enumerated under the names of Cenimagni, Segontiaci, Ancalitæ, and Bibroci, occupying apparently the counties of Berks and Buckingham, and the neighbourhood of Henley and Bray.³ The British chief, reduced to his single stronghold, defended himself with the natural fortifications of forest and morass which surrounded his city. He excited the people of Cantium, or Kent, to attack the naval camp of the invaders; but while they were repulsed with loss and discomfiture, he was obliged himself to escape from the fastness which he could no longer maintain. Reduced to extremity, he sued for peace, which he obtained by the surrender of his usurped sovereignty, and the promise of hostages

Cæsar's partial successes in Britain.

He accepts the promise of tribute, and returns into Gaul.

¹ Polyænus (Stratagem. viii. 23. 5.) says that the Britons were terrified by Cæsar's making use of an elephant in this attack.

² We may conjecture that this was Verulamium, or St. Alban's, the site in after-times of a great Roman colony. If it had been Londinium, which was a place of considerable commercial importance only an hundred years later (Tac. Ann. xiv. 33.), we should doubtless have been informed that it lay on the bank of the river.

³ Camden, Britannia. Mœbe, Cas. in loc.

and tribute from the various states which he had combined against the Romans.¹ Cæsar was anxious to return to Gaul, where rumours of projected insurrection were more rife than ever.² He retained no territory in Britain, nor left any stronghold or garrison; and when he quitted its shore, with the nugatory assurance of a trifling tribute, he must have felt himself baffled in his enterprise. Even the hopes of plunder were totally unfulfilled. Cicero, who corresponded, as we have seen, with his brother Quintus, serving under the proconsul in his British campaign, assures us that nothing was to be obtained from the poverty of the natives. No silver plate could be extorted from them, nor booty of any kind acquired, except perhaps slaves; and these were not of the refined and educated class, such as the conquests of Lucullus and Pompeius had poured into Rome from Asia, ingenious artisans or professors of literature and music, but the rough uncouth children of woods and mountains, whom their masters would be ashamed to employ beyond the limits of some distant farm.³

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 22.

² Such seems to be the meaning of Cicero's expression in a letter to Trebatius (ad Div. vii. 6.), who remained in Gaul, at Samarobriva, declining to accompany the expedition into Britain: "Quanquam vos nunc istic satis calere audio." Or does it merely refer to the great heat of the summer already noticed? There had been an extremely hot season at Rome also: "Ex magnis caloribus, non enim memini majores." . . . Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 1., written in Sept., 700. But Cæsar was evidently in great haste to leave Britain; see c. 23. Comp. Dion, xl. 45.

³ Cic. ad Att. iv. 16.: "Etiam illud jam cognitum est, neque argenti scripulum esse in illa insula, neque ullam spem prædæ nisi ex mancipiis: ex quibus nulos puto te literis aut musicis eruditos exspectare." So also to Trebatius (ad Div. vii. 7.): "In Britannia nihil esse audio neque auri neque argenti. Id si ita est, essendum aliquid suadeo capias, et ad nos quamprimum recurras." This hope of plunder is a favourite topic in his correspondence. Again to Trebatius, vi. 16.: "Balbus mihi confirmavit te divitem futurum. Id utrum Romano more locutus sit, bene nummatum te futurum, an quomodo Stoici dicunt, omnes esse divites qui cœlo et terra frui

These short campaigns against the Germans and Britons sufficed to occupy the intervals during which Cæsar was watching the conflict of parties in Rome ; they maintained his troops in active exercise, afforded pretences for multiplying his legions, and fostered the cupidity or ambition of his officers. But the eyes of the pro-consul were still steadily turned towards Italy, and he omitted no opportunity of betaking himself to the frontier of his province to obtain a nearer view of the transactions of the capital. However, on his second return from Britain, it became manifest that his recent conquests were in imminent peril, and that his presence throughout the winter was indispensable to their security. The assembly of the Gaulish states was convened at Samarobriva (Amiens), and Cæsar employed, according to his system, the authority of the deputies among their own tribes to give a colour of national will to the decrees which in reality issued from his own mouth alone. The council was dissolved before the end of autumn, and its members returned each to his own city, bearing with him the mandates of the conqueror, by which the internal polity of the province was regulated, and new contributions, both of money and men, were assessed. Unpalatable as these requisitions were to the proud and jealous chieftains, circumstances contributed at the moment to give a chance of success to a combined attack upon the enemy from whom they emanated. The summer had been excessively dry, and it was found impossible to maintain the great mass of the Roman forces in one locality. Accordingly, the eight legions of which they consisted were distributed through the country of disaffection in Gaul.

General spirit

The Roman
forces are distributed over too wide a surface.

possint, postea videro." In Plutarch's life (Cæs. 23.) Cæsar is said, κακῶσαι τοὺς πολεμίους λᾶλλον ἢ τοὺς ἕδίους ὀφελῆσαι, οὕδεν γὰρ ὅτι καὶ λαβεῖν ἦν ἄξιον ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων κακοθίων καὶ πενήτων.

of the Belgians, among the Morini, the Nervii, the Remi, the Treviri and the Eburones, in small divisions and under various commanders.¹ The Gauls calculated, we may presume, on the proconsul's usual departure to Italy, and standing more in awe of him personally than of all his lieutenants, they proposed to delay their general attack on his winter quarters until his back should be turned.² But although compelled to risk it, he was aware of the danger of dividing his forces, and accordingly he stationed himself at Samarobriva, a central post, whence he could conveniently combine the direction both of military and civil affairs.³

The first indication of the insurrectionary spirit ^{Revolt of the Belgians.} about to break forth throughout the north of Gaul was an isolated act of violence on the part of the Carnutes, who suddenly massacred Tasgetius, the chieftain appointed by the Roman government to exercise sovereignty in their state.⁴ That this was a public and not a private act of vengeance appeared from the complicity of the magistrates and other influential men of the tribe. The Carnutes, however, were not in a condition to vindicate their deed, and the speedy arrival of a legion, which took up its winter-quarters among them, repressed any further movement on their part against

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 24.

² Cæsar gives us to infer that he had no intention of quitting Northern Gaul during the winter: "Si ipse . . . in Gallia morari constituit" (v. 25.). Dion (xl. 8.) maintains that he was on his way into Italy when recalled by the perilous posture of his affairs; and this account would seem to be confirmed by the ignorance of his officers whether he was in Gaul or not. See below.

³ Cæsar seems anxious to extenuate the extent to which he dispersed his forces, where he says that all his divisions, except that quartered among the Essui in Normandy, where there was no apprehension of disturbance, were posted within a distance of a hundred miles. But the distance from Aduatuca to the frontiers of the Bellovacii (c. 46.) is little less than two hundred miles.

⁴ Cæs. B.G. v. 25.

the Roman power. The affair was judicially investigated, and the guilty parties were sent to the proconsul for punishment. Meanwhile, however, a vast conspiracy, was ripening in the north of Belgium.¹ Ambiorix, a youthful leader of the Eburones, obtained the honour of striking the first blow, in which he displayed no less craft than courage. He had been treated with much favour by the Romans, and had acquired no small share of their confidence. That he should be the first to attack those who called themselves his benefactors, caused equal surprise and concern. The Romans, however, were not unprepared. The assault which he conducted against the camp of Sabinus and Cotta they repulsed without difficulty. Thus baffled, Ambiorix requested a conference with his opponents, in which he declared himself a genuine friend of the Romans, but compelled by the violence of his own people to head an attack upon them. The tribe itself, he asserted, was only acting under similar compulsion, for it was unable to resist the power of the great Gaulish confederacy, which had been long preparing, and was now in the act of executing, a simultaneous assault upon all the Roman quarters. In two days a large body of Germans would arrive to reinforce the assailants. He ended by entreating the Roman officers to evacuate their camp while there yet was time, and consult, not their own safety only, but the general good, by seeking a junction with one of the other divisions of their army, the nearest of which, that of Q. Cicero, was fifty miles distant.²

Craft and courage of Ambiorix.

¹ Besides Cæsar, Dion, xl. 5—11.; Plut. Cæs. 24.

² Cæs. B. G. v. 27.; Dion, xl. 5, 6. This writer follows the Commentaries of Cæsar very closely, and it is important to remark that they still formed the text-book for this period of history after an interval of 250 years. It may be inferred also that the charges of treachery which Cæsar makes against the Gauls had not been discredited by subsequent authorities.

Long and anxious was the consultation which took place in the Roman quarters. Cotta and Sabinus differed in opinion; the one was for maintaining the post at all hazards, the other for falling back upon Cicero's legion. Strange to say, Sabinus could urge in behalf of the latter course, that it was uncertain whether Cæsar was himself in Gaul, or whether he had departed for Italy. The news of the rash violence of the Carnutes was appealed to in proof that the vigilant control of the proconsul must have been withdrawn; the sudden defection of the Eburones was supposed to confirm this presumption. It seems incredible that Cæsar should really have left his officers in uncertainty on a matter of such primary importance for the direction of their conduct, and we are compelled to imagine that such doubts were expressed merely for the purpose of giving a colour to a disgraceful and cowardly proceeding. Cotta finally yielded to his colleague's representations, and it was resolved to effect a retreat. On their march the two legions fell into an ambuscade, notwithstanding the friendly assurances in which they had been tempted to confide. Surrounded in a narrow valley they were compelled to abandon their baggage, and under the direction of Cotta (for Sabinus had lost all presence of mind), ranged themselves in a circle to maintain to the last a desperate struggle with their destroyers. This manœuvre, effective as it had often proved in saving the armies of the republic in the most dire extremities, was on this occasion of no avail. After baffling repeated attacks, the Romans succumbed at last, under the constant shower of missiles by which they were harassed from every side. Sabinus, while attempting to discuss the forms of a capitulation, was treacherously slain; and Cotta, who had refused to parley with an armed enemy, met a more honourable death in the front of his destroy two Roman

The Eburones
legions.

slender ranks. The Roman army was almost entirely destroyed; the few that escaped through the forests in the darkness of the night were merely stragglers, without baggage, arms, or ensigns.¹

This destruction of two complete legions with their generals was the signal for a wide-spread defection throughout central Belgium. The <sup>Attack upon camp.</sup> Eburones, Nervii, and Aduatuci were reinforced by numerous but less conspicuous tribes. Ambiorix, able and energetic, and crowned with the glory of a triumph which reminded men of the ancient days of Gaulish renown, was the soul of the confederacy. He marched immediately upon the camp of Q. Cicero, whose single legion was quartered in the Nervian territory. Letters were despatched from the camp to Cæsar, but these were intercepted, and for many days the proconsul was left in entire ignorance of the movements of the enemy, and the dangers to which his troops were exposed.
Q. Cicero's

The correspondence of the orator, M. Cicero, represents him throughout in the light of <sup>Character of
Q. Cicero.</sup> an adviser, almost of a tutor or guardian, to his younger brother Quintus, and the character of the latter has been overshadowed by the greater celebrity and higher merits of the former. But Q. Cicero, though he cannot aspire to be numbered in the first class of the statesmen of his day, holds nevertheless a prominent place among the men of tried services and abilities, who contributed to stamp the national character upon the Roman administration at home and abroad. Rising upon the wave of his brother's fortunes, and supported by his own talents and good conduct, he had served various public offices of distinction. In the ordinary career of honours, he had arrived at the prætorship, in which he was colleague to Cæsar in the year 692.

¹ Cæs. B.G. v. 37.; Dion, l. c.

enemy in case it should be intercepted.¹ The javelin stuck in one of the towers of the wall, and was not discovered till the next day. By this time the speedy arrival of succour was announced by the smoke of the burning villages which marked the progress of the exasperated Romans. The Gauls broke up from their lines and marched, sixty thousand strong, to confront the enemy. But even then Cæsar was obliged to disguise the slender amount of his forces, before he could induce his opponents to hazard an attack. A steady resistance broke their ^{and is saved by Cæsar's arrival.} onset and put them to the rout, and thus Quintus Cicero with his little band, harassed and weakened as it had been, was saved from the fate which had overtaken his colleagues.²

The news of their common disaster soon reached the various armies of the confederates, and they disappeared in a moment from the astonished eyes of the Roman generals.

^{Cæsar remains in the north of Gaul during the winter.} Indutiomarus retreated from before the camp of Labienus, and sought an asylum among the Treviri. The hosts of the Armorican states, which were threatening Roscius in the country of the Essui, and had arrived within eight miles of his position, dispersed without a blow. The pro-consul collected three legions around Samarobriva, and took up his station there again for the rest of the winter, fully occupied with watching the affairs of Belgium. Excepting the Remi and the Aedui, who had devoted themselves without reserve to the interests of the republic, there was hardly a state to which grave suspicions of disaffection did not attach. Slow and timid as the Gauls were in the beginning of a movement, from their want of mutual communication an reliance, yet, once begun, all were ready to join it with heart and hand, and the open defection of two nations whose valour they were most accustomed to respect, exasperated their resolution and embittered their defiance, in proportion as it heightened the danger of their cause.

¹ See above, p. 265. Dion in mentioning this circumstance remarks that Cæsar's usual mode of secret communication was by the use of each fourth letter from the one intended (xl. 9.).

² These events are detailed at great length, Cæs. B.G. v. 42—52.

In this critical position of their affairs, the defenders of Gaulish liberty had now recourse to the aid of the barbarians beyond the Rhine. But the followers of Ariovistus had been disheartened by the disasters they had already experienced in collision with the Roman arms, and the fate of the Usipetes and their allies, together with the subsequent invasion of their own soil, had terrified the rest of the Germans. No assistance could be obtained from that quarter.¹ But, notwithstanding this disappointment, Indutiomarus persisted in moving the Gauls to revolt. He had acquired great personal influence throughout their tribes by the friends he had attached to himself by gifts and promises. He now stepped boldly forward, claimed the leadership of the whole confederacy, and convened an armed council of their chiefs. The severity of the national institutions demanded, it is said, that whoever was last to attend such a summons should be publicly put to death with tortures and infamy. In this assembly Indutiomarus denounced his rival Cingetorix as the enemy of the common cause, and the latter was not slow to avenge himself by divulging to Labienus the schemes of his accuser. It was against Labienus himself that the first outbreak was directed. A numerous host of Gaulish cavalry careered round his works, taunting his soldiers with insults and menaces. But the legate, forewarned, had formed his plan of defence. He suffered the enemy to exhaust their energies by a attack Labienus's camp. The death of Indu-tiomarus breaks up the confederacy.

The Gauls

long and fruitless endeavour to draw him forth to an engagement, and it was not till he had collected all the auxiliary forces within reach, and thoroughly wearied his assailants, that he threw open his gates and gave the signal for a sally. He issued strict orders that the person of Indutiomarus himself should be the object of every soldier's aim. He forbade them to engage with any one of the enemy until the leader had been taken and slain. The Gauls offered little resistance to this vigorous onslaught, and Indutiomarus was overtaken in crossing a ford. His death completed the easy victory of the Romans; the Nervii and Eburones fled precipitately to their homes, and the confederacy rapidly dissolved.¹

The close of the year brought a short period of respite to the Roman soldiery, but the winter months were hardly less full of solicitude to their officers, especially to Cæsar, who now clearly saw that he had before him the task of completely reconquering the country.² It was necessary to recruit his diminished forces by extensive levies.

Cæsar makes great additional levies for his sixth campaign, A. U. 701. B. C. 53. and borrows a legion from Pompeius.

Orders were issued for raising two fresh legions, and the proconsul obtained a third as a loan from Pompeius³, who did not hesitate to transfer to him a portion of the forces which the republic had assigned to himself. This legion had indeed been levied in Cisalpine Gaul by a special decree of the senate, and might seem therefore to belong of right rather to Cæsar than to his rival. But that Pompeius should have thus consented to strengthen the hands of a competitor of whom he had long been jealous, shows how secure he deemed himself in the exercise of the new powers he had obtained on the expiration of his consulship, and the reliance he placed on the friends and adherents with whom he had doubtless officered the new legion. The transaction displays also in a striking manner how independent the chiefs of the commonwealth felt themselves to be, when they ventured thus to lend and borrow troops among themselves, without even consulting, as far as appears, the superior authorities of the state.¹

¹ Cæs. B. G. v. 58.

² Cæs. B. G. vi. 1. "Multis ac causis majorem Galliæ motum expectans."

³ Cæs. B. G. l. c.; comp. Dion, xl. 65. Plutarch's error, who speaks of two legions as thus lent, is explained by Mœbe, in Cæs. l. c.

Cæsar's levies proceeded rapidly, and it was his policy as well as his pride to show how speedily Rome could repair her military losses, and pour legion after legion into the field. The Belgian tribes were actively engaged in forming alliances among themselves; the Cisrhene Germans united heartily with them; the Senones and others openly refused obedience to their foreign masters; every thing portended a general insurrection in the north-east of Gaul, when Cæsar, before the winter had yet passed, anticipated the approaching movement by pushing four legions into the country of the Nervii. A few rapid marches and energetic proclamations daunted successively the spirit of these people, of the Senones, the Carnutes and others. But the Treviri constituted the main strength of the disaffected, and the loss of all these auxiliaries was supplied by the assistance of various German tribes, together with the Menapii and Eburones, who joined in their revolt, and distracted the attention of the Roman generals. While Cæsar pursued the Menapii into their fastnesses, Labienus overcame the Treviri in a battle to which he enticed them by a feigned retreat. Cæsar reached the Rhine

Cæsar chas-
tises the Tre-viri and Menapii, and crosses the Rhine.

¹ See Cæsar's simple account of the transaction (l.c.). We shall find that a few years later, when the struggle was about to commence between Cæsar and Pompeius, the latter demanded his legion to be restored to him, and the other made no attempt to retain it (B.G. viii. 54.); Plut. Cæs. 29.; Appian, B.C. ii. 29.

and crossed it by a bridge, constructed at some distance above the spot of his former passage.¹ Finding, however, that the Suevi had retired, and hidden themselves in the dense Hercynian forests, he desisted from the pursuit, and was satisfied with leaving a garrison at the head of the bridge, of which he cut down the portion which abutted on the right bank of the river. He then turned his forces upon the centre of the Belgian confederacy. His lieutenant Basilus, at the head of the cavalry, made a bold dash at the person of Ambiorix, who narrowly escaped the unexpected attack, and was compelled to break up his plans for the campaign, and recommend his troops to consult their safety by dispersion. The Segni and Condrusi, Germanic tribes, sent in their submission, with loud assertions of the constancy with which they had refused to aid the confederates. The conqueror was not unwilling to accept their excuses.

But in the midst of these successes the conduct of the war still presented great difficulties. The Eburones, in whose stronghold Aduatuca, the proconsul, had now established his quarters, possessed no other fortresses.

He offers the plunder of the Eburones to the neighbouring tribes. They could not be reached in any vital part. The conquest and occupation of their country seemed to make no permanent impression upon a tribe of hunters and foresters. Once more was the Roman general compelled to scatter his forces in various directions. The Menapii, lately reduced, were again in arms, and it required the presence of three legions under Labienus to check their adventurous reprisals. Q. Cicero was left with one legion to maintain possession of Aduatuca, while three others were entrusted to C. Trebonius, with orders to devastate the country round, and prevent the nearer approach of the enemy. Cæsar himself issued forth in quest of Ambiorix, in whose death or capture he took the greatest interest. As long as large bodies of troops kept together, they were secure from the isolated attacks of the barbarians; but as soon as they ventured to pursue or plunder, they were exposed to be cut off in detail in a country which was no other than one great ambuscade. It was in these straits that Cæsar determined to employ the last resource of an unscrupulous invader. He circulated a proclamation through the neighbouring states, declaring the Eburones traitors to Rome and outlaws from the human race, offering at the same time their lives and their goods as a common prey to any one who would venture to take them.¹ This sufficed to call forth all the tribes which cherished any jealousy of that ill-fated people, and every man with a private quarrel to avenge could wreak his fury under the protection of Rome. It put arms into the hands of every adventurer, whether Gaulish or German, who might choose to enrich himself by rapine and murder. Such, if seems, was the state of mutual hostility in which the Gaulish tribes dwelt among one another, that an announcement of this kind sufficed to break all the late-cemented ties of interest and friendship, and to enlist overwhelming multitudes in the work of destruction. The Eburones, it must be remembered, were an alien people, descendants of the Cimbri and Teutones of old. The neighbouring races were for the most part indifferent or even hostile to them. The proconsul's summons was welcomed with savage alacrity. The Gauls rushed headlong upon their victims, who, we may presume, did not perish without a desperate struggle. But from whatever quarter it flowed, it was the blood of enemies, and the Romans looked on coolly and securely while the ranks of the assailants were thinned, and while the whole clan of the Eburones was butchered and their very name obliterated from the map of Gaul.

¹ Cæs. B.G. vi. 9.; Dion, xl. 32.

¹ Cæs. B.G. vi. 34.: “Cæsar ad finitimas civitates nuncios dimittit, ad se evocat, spe prædæ, ad diripiendos Eburones, ut potius in sylvis Gallorum vita quam legionarius miles periclitetur: simul ut, magna multitudine circumfusa, pro tali facinore stirps ac nomen civitatis tollatur.” Dion, xl. 32.

Modern warfare rarely presents such frightful

Reflections upon this act of severity.

scenes as must have marked the annihilation of the Eburones; nor did the Romans often allow themselves to display such terrible examples of their vengeance. The transaction we have just related has accordingly been employed, and not unnaturally, to fix a foul blot upon Cæsar's character. Yet we know that his countrymen uniformly represented him as humane, and even indulgent to every enemy, domestic or barbarian: and this act must in fairness be contemplated from a Roman point of view, whence alone a just conception can be obtained of his motives and conduct.

The Romans vaunted with peculiar complacency

The laws of war as understood by the Romans.

their professed horror at all political treachery. In their public transactions, especially in the field, they did, perhaps, exercise some self-denial in maintaining the principles of good faith. Their history presents undoubtedly remarkable instances of punishments inflicted upon their own commanders who had postponed force to fraud in dealing with the enemy. The religious pretensions of the Romans were not altogether nugatory. They demanded in every case an apparent cause of war, as well as the observation of due forms of warfare. Even to the last the popular voice, exerted in the area of the forum or from the tribunes' bench, was powerful to recal statesmen and captains to a sense of the prescriptive principles of justice. But the laws of nations, as held by the encroaching republic, might neither be regarded nor known by some of its rude opponents. Fierce was its wrath and loud its reclamations against the alleged perfidy of the injured and the ignorant. We have seen, in the case of the Veneti, how harsh was the punishment which the infraction of a conqueror's terms was deemed to justify. Even in the purest ages of the commonwealth the infliction of pain and death had never disturbed a Roman general in the discharge of his public duty. But civil war is the worst corrupter both of honour and humanity. Fraud and violence conspired to brutalize the national character. Consuls and imperators, whether at home or abroad, learned to protect their own lives by taking unscrupulous advantage of every opponent. They dealt to their foes the same measure they were trained themselves to expect, and it can hardly be said that they held an enemy's blood much cheaper than their own. Still the aggressions of the Romans, with all their enormity, were conducted for the most part on certain recognized principles. The passions of the Gauls, on the other hand, were wholly uncontrolled. It was the Gauls themselves who rushed, at a foe's bidding, to destroy their own compatriots; their lust of plunder overcame both sympathy and prudence. Civilization has at least the power of atoning in some measure for its own crimes. The conquests of the republic were, on the whole, a career of human improvement, and conducted to the diffusion of juster views and milder sentiments than prevailed among the barbarians it subdued.

When Cæsar quitted Aduatuca in pursuit of Ambiorix, directing his course to the northern confines of the great forest of Arduenna, between the lower Scheldt and the Meuse, he assured Q. Cicero that he would return within seven days. The work of massacre and pillage had already commenced. The Gauls from far and near hastened to the destruction of their own friends

A body of Germans crosses the Rhine to plunder the Eburones,

and allies; but besides these assailants a small body of Germans joined in the onslaught, allured across the Rhine by hopes of booty.¹ They had effected the passage of the river on rafts, and escaped the vigilance of Cæsar's outposts. They penetrated on the track of blood and plunder even to the vicinity of the Roman quarters at Aduatuca. Here they paused and inquired after the much-dreaded name of Cæsar, and when they heard that he was absent, lent willing ears to the bold suggestion of an Eburon captive. In three hours, he said, you can reach Aduatuca; poor and scanty is the plunder you have obtained from my country; the further you advance the less will you glean from the leavings of our neighbours' rapacity; but in the camp of Cicero are all the proconsul's stores, all his resources for the campaign, and all the booty he has swept within his net. The garrison is too slender even to man the walls which surround, but cannot protect, all this wealth. The Germans embraced the adventure with alacrity, and the Eburon rejoiced in the certain destruction of the one or the other of his enemies.

The garrison of Aduataca was, indeed, by no means so slender as had been represented, out-numbering very considerably the handful of Germans who had thus undertaken to surprise and destroy it. We may suppose, however, that the marauders had gathered numbers on their route, and at the moment of their sudden appearance before the encampment five cohorts of the legion were foraging at a short distance. The seventh day had passed, no news of the proconsul had arrived, provisions were scarce in the camp, and no appearance of an enemy at hand. Nevertheless, Cicero's incantiousness in thus reducing his strength nearly proved fatal to him. The attack of the Germans and is tempted to attack the Roman station at Aduatuca,

was so sudden, the defence so feeble, that the place was on the point of being carried at the first onset. The absent cohorts returned from their excursion; but the enemy had placed himself between them and the camp, and, despising the smallness of their numbers, expected an easy victory. The Romans, moreover, were mostly new levies, being a portion of the armament which had been raised that winter in Italy. They had been officered, however, with picked men from the veteran legions, and were now saved by the skill and discipline of their centurions. They were instructed to form the cuneus or wedge, and so rush with all their force upon the opposing ranks. Their weight and steadiness bore down all resistance, and the moving mass burst through the crowd of barbarians till it reached the gates of the camp, which were speedily opened to receive it. Thus baffled, the Germans lost heart, and made the best of their way homewards, with as much of their booty as the time and their own fears would allow them to secure: for Cæsar was now close upon their rear, and they were much more ready to believe in his approach than the Romans themselves, who had given way to despair, convinced that his defeat and death could alone have thus brought the Germans so suddenly upon them.¹

Cæsar, indeed, had been unsuccessful in the chief object of his late expedition, the capture or slaughter of Ambiorix. He set out once more and ravaged the districts through which he passed with fire and sword; still the wily Eburon was able to elude his pursuit. In vain did the captives of each day's skirmish declare, when brought into the proconsul's presence, that they had but just seen the fugitive, that he must still be close at hand, that he was defenceless and but are disappointed in their enterprise.

Cæsar leaves Gaul for Italy at the conclusion of his sixth campaign.

¹ Cæs. B.G. vi. 35—41.

alone, or attended at most by a mere handful of followers; for the rewards with which the Romans urged his people to betray him rendered him everywhere insecure. As the season drew to a close, and no enemy appeared any longer in the field, the labours of the campaign came at last to an end. Cæsar convened the general assembly at Durocortorum, and charged it to inquire into the guilt of the Senones and Carnutes; but he treated those people with unexpected mildness, and was satisfied with the sacrifice of a single victim. Two legions he stationed in the country of the Treviri, two among the Lingones, but the remaining six he concentrated at Agedicum, in the territory of the Senones.¹ Having made these dispositions, he no longer hesitated to take the road for Italy, intending to hold the assembly of the Cisalpine states, and make at the same time a nearer survey of affairs at Rome, where events had occurred of the utmost importance towards the development of his schemes.

The death of Julia had occurred during the period

The alliance of Cæsar and Pompeius dissolved by the death of Julia, Crassus, and Clodius. of Cæsar's second invasion of Britain. He had felt his bereavement with the keenness of genuine affection²; nevertheless, he had not suffered his sorrow to suspend the progress of his arms³; nor did he fail, we may suppose, to forecast, with cool deliberation, the changes it seemed to open in the great political game he was playing at Rome. The tie which bound him, however loosely and precariously, to Pompeius, was now rudely severed.⁴ Cæsar was

¹ Cæs. B. G. vi. 44.

² See Cic. ad Qu. Fr. iii. 1. : "O me sollicitum, quantum ego dolui in Cæsaris suavissimis litteris!"

³ Senec. Cons. ad Marc. 1.4. : "Intra diem tertium imperatoria obiit munia et tam cito dolorem vicit quam omnia solebat."

⁴ Senec. l. c. : "In oculis erat Cn. Pompeius, non æquo latrurus animo quemquam alium esse in republica magnum."

aware that, crowned with laurels and followed by legions, he was no longer, even in the eyes of his vain associate, the mere aspiring adventurer who had crossed the Alps to seek political distinction. He had become a formidable rival even to the first man in the republic. He could not doubt that his recent connexion would now recoil from his alliance, and employ his recovered freedom to form a new compact with his deadliest enemies. Cæsar was not yet prepared to meet and defy such a combination in the curia and the forum. His plans were not yet ripe, his position not yet assured. He might fear to be precipitated into a struggle with the oligarchy at home, while Gaul was yet unconquered, and the basis of his future operations unsecured. But other catastrophes followed, which could not fail to widen the breach, and poison the sources of disunion. Our next chapter will record the expedition of Crassus into Asia, and its final termination. The triple league was definitively dissolved by the death of the triumvir, whose peculiar position and personal qualities marked him as best fitted to hold the balance between his jealous colleagues; or constituted him, in the language of the poet, the isthmus which forbade the collision of two encroaching oceans.¹ Was anything more wanting to expose to the survivors the hollowness of their alliance, and the natural antipathy of their views and tempers, it was supplied by the removal of Clodius from the theatre of affairs, the man whom they had conspired to support, each for his own ulterior purposes. The news of the death of Clodius greeted Cæsar immediately upon his arrival on the frontier of his province.² The circumstances which attended it com-

¹ Lucan, i. 100.:

“Qualiter undas

Qui secat, et geminum gracilis mare separat isthmus.”

² Cæs. Bell. Gall. vii. 1.: “Ibi cognoscit de Clodii cæde.”

peled the senate, as we shall see, to throw all its power into the hands of Pompeius, to exalt him to a greater pre-eminence than he had ever yet enjoyed, to inflame his pride, to enhance his self-confidence, and to tempt him finally to break with the leaders of the popular cause.

END OF THE FIRST VOLUME.